KINGDOM-SEEKING.

Children! the word of the Lord says, "seek first the kingdom of God:"—and that is two fold—"peace, righteousness, and joy in the Holy Ghost,"—and also the government of God, by Christ and his saints, wherein righteousness, peace and divine joy, reign and shine, the purest and finest fire of the immortal life of God. And how comes the godly seeking? From a sensitively felt need, and from a gleam of intelligent apprehension of the preciousness of such a kingdom with its inherent triune sisterhood of blessing.

How are we doing, now, in this way? how faring and thriving in this road of duty, this call to come up higher. When the Lord, said, "seek," he said well, and when he said "seek first" he said well in that also. And there is where the old man carnal, is ever ready to thrust his shaggy rebel head into sight, and say with a whispered grimness,—"let us seek the earthly things first, seek them a little, seek them carefully, and prayerfully, but seek them first, and so lay a foundation for seeking the kingdom next. Yes,—and doubtful foundation, if not outright, a sandy one! For the Lord knows best, and his order should be not reversed. The good God first; the good God of all boundless power, blessing and possibility, first. If we put the fear before the greater, we are wrong-minded and unwise. The Lord will have our faith, to begin all right-living. I see the beauty and power of faith. If I have a patient whom I am to treat, I want his confidence—or if I have a people to whom I am to preach, I want theirs, as that in the one case, I can prescribe well, and in the other case, can preach well. So God wants our faith. This gives him Divine liberty of action." It gives him moral support, and justifies and invites his large and grand operative miracle-working, even,—in the sphere of mind, where the creature is endowed with sense and will, with reason, and judgment and moral choice. And still more. Unless I seek God first, and his moral government first, I am unfit to use temporal good aright. Nay the very more I get and have, the more awkwardly and even blindly I may use it.

But, come, now, let us trust God truly, trust him fittingly, trust him legally. Let the motto be,—God only;—God's will only;—God's Kingdom first, God's righteousness first and to the front. If I am tempted, let me resist temptation. If I reason on the low plane of my selfishness, or the low level of mere present and petty expediency, if I do that, I will be sure to smart for it. I will have a thorn in my time-serving mind. Some hornet of worry or compunction will thrust his sting into my comfort, and poison it. Come now. We have a call to a higher life. We have a call from our blessed and dearly beloved shepherd. Do we not hear it? Tell me who is like him, for loveliness, and exalted God-likeness? Does no not say, lean on God, live to God, love God and learn of him?

I always heard and read a great deal about consecration,—unreserved and entire consecration. I dare say I have heard preaching that almost fired and frightened me. I thought it was a thing high and hard. I had not the genius or fitness for it. I had a fear of it, and a shrinking from it. But God spared my life—and I thank him for it,—and I have treaded my way on and on, erring, and trembling, seeking the truth, suffering disappointments,—dashed and broken and desponding. But the voice of Jesus said, come. I heard faintly, and struggled on. Many a time, I said, "O, thou good and omnipotent One, by all that is merciful and mighty in God, hear me. By all that is lovely and precious and pure and pitiful and kind, help me. Raise me from the dead. Raise me with power irresistible. Speak and it is done. Give the word and I live. Do wonderfully like God." And I say it many times yet, and again. And in the course of experiences and events, there comes more and more a consecration. Sins are wrestled with and not least of all unbelief. I bare all my heart and mind to God, and say a thousand times, "Come in. Thou art a thousand times welcome." And then I must not doubt and disbelieve that God is willing to come in, and does come in. My believing sets the seal to his coming, and makes it mine in priceless possession. And I find myself saying—"Now, good God,—blessed Father—I am thine with all my soul and power. I am thine with every faculty, every gift, every possibility of thought and intention—of behavior and achievement, of life and labor. I am thine to do just that thou callest me to do, and that I do joyfully.

Children;—I believe in God's call to any work he has for us, to any duty or labor under heaven—and the recognizableness and efficiency of the call, if we are full of earnest seeking. Day and night will prayers go up like the endless smoke of incense. And deathless must be the longing for the perfect immortal life, which is to be the finished fitness for kingship, and happy will be the dawn of that day, when the Immortal Friend, with a smile shall give his beloved, rest, and with a word, speak their fears and woes and weariness forever fled and ended.

O. COLEGROVE.

A FEW REMARKS ON PROPHECY.

It is a mistake to suppose that only men of learning can understand prophecy. Of course, learned men, if they are not wise above what is written, can understand it better than unlearned men. But men of common sense and ordinary judgment, and able to read Scripture for themselves, may, if they are spiritually minded, and seek divine guidance, understand prophecy in its great and important features. And the most learned cannot understand it in all its details. Let us cherish a desire to understand all that we can, and in a teachable, prayerful spirit, search the word. But we must do this without attachment to any particular theory; our object must be not to find proofs of any preconceived opinion, but to ascertain just what the word teaches whether for or against views we have already formed. The desire for the truth must be supreme. And the love of the truth must be greater than our love of popularity. It is better to be in the minority with the truth, than in the majority with error.

Some think that instead of studying unfulfilled prophecy, they should let it it alone and wait patiently for its fulfilment, and then the fulfilment, whenever that might take place, would confirm their faith in the word of God. But this certainly cannot be the only use God intends us to make of prophecy. He purposes that we should study it now, and so acquaint ourselves with events that are really coming upon us. Why are future events foretold if they are not to be considered, and, as far as possible, understood, that we may be prepared for them? The word of prophecy is given to us as a light to enable us to know the things that will shortly come to pass. If we do not make use of that light, we shall continue in ignorance of those things, and some of them may come upon us unawares and find us unprepared. The future is dark except as prophecy throws light upon it.

The fact of such a diversity of opinion has been a source of discouragement to every student of prophecy. And the first important inquiry on this point is to ascertain, if possible, the source of that diversity. Now we do not hesitate to say that many expositors—we fear, the greater number of expositors—have started wrong; they have begun their interpretations on a wrong principle. The basis has been unsound, and therefore, the superstructure has been unsound. There seems to have been a pretty general desire to find many of the prophecies already fulfilled; and hence history has been searched most diligently to find events which would correspond with the things that predicted. Many of the things are predicted, and which are yet future, will one day become history; and as it is not difficult, therefore, to find some things in past history which bear a partial resemblance to some of the things which are yet to take place. Hence one expositor, to find a fulfilment of a certain prediction, will fix upon one class of events that have transpired, and claim that that prediction has been fulfilled in them; and another will fix upon another class in which he insists that that prediction has met with its fulfilment; and so of others. Now the fact that they cannot agree is evidence that they are all wrong; for when any particular prophecy is fulfilled, the events will be of such a nature that it will be impossible to mistake them.

There are certain things to be accomplished in connection with the fulfilment of the principal predictions, which we know have never yet been accomplished, and therefore, do not belong to past history. By this we feel certain that the fulfilment is still future. And when the prophecies are fulfilled, there will be more than some resemblance between what is foretold and what has come to pass. There will be an exact correspondence. What God has foretold, will be found to come true; not one jot or tittle of his word shall fail. There will be no difference of opinion then as to whether what God predicted has come to pass. The present diversity exists through trying to find a past fulfilment in things to which there is only a partial resemblance.

Many of the prophecies, in relating the glorious things that shall take place in the reign of the Messiah, mix up with them relations of the awful judgments that shall also take place; for guided by the Holy Spirit, the prophets foresaw that great worldly power would be arrayed against the rotting up of David's throne. Hence the analogy of Scripture must be prayerfully considered, and great discrimination must be used, in order rightly to locate the judgments and the blessings.

Past fulfilments of prophecy confirm our faith in those which have yet to be fulfilled. Scores of prophecies, some in relation to the first Advent of Christ, some in relation to the Jews, and others in relation to the Gentile powers have already been fulfilled to the very letter, and this should dispel all doubt in regard to the fulfilment of others. We should believe the prophecies so that all can see that our belief has a saving influence upon our lives.

THE SEVENTH-DAY. No. 5.

[Copyrighted. 1887.]

THE SABBATH CONTROVERSY NOT A NEW THING.

If the seventh-day is still binding, and Sunday is only the Pope's Sabbath, why was it not found out before? This is always a hard question for Sabbatarians to answer. They claim, however that the time had not come till now for the light on this question to be given. The reformers and the church did not have their attention called to the Sabbath question, did not have the light on it, and so sinned ignorantly and were not guilty, because they knew no better. But now the time has come when the arguments for the Sabbath must, for the first time, be clearly set before the world, and every honest man will obey it, and the rest will be damned. This is now the test of acceptance with God and a preparation to meet Jesus. Mrs. E. G. White, in "Experience and Views" p. 25, states in substance as above, and this is what they all hold. This is what I was led to believe when I began to keep the seventh day.

But the truth is, as I have found since, that this very question has been up time and again all along the history of the church, all the arguments for the seventh day have been brought out and urged as now. They have been examined and refuted by the most pious men of the past the same as now. It is simply an old Judaizing notion often revived in some new phase, to flourish awhile, and then go down, as it had often done before.

In proof of this, one only needs to turn to the pages of the "History of the Sabbath, by Elder Andrews, the Seventh-day Adventist historian. As they will not question his statements, I refer to it rather than to other authors.

On page 400, he finds observers of the seventh day in Rome as early as A. D. 600. They were numerous enough to attract the attention of the Pope. About A. D. 1100 he finds Sabbatarians in France "of sufficient Importance to call down upon themselves the anathema of the Pope." p. 420. Nicetas, one of the most learned men of his day, "wrote a book to prove that the Sabbath ought to be kept holy." p. 422. At that time the Anabaptists "maintained the Saturday Sabbath to be in force." p. 423. In the latter part of the fifteenth century he finds the whole nation of the Abyssinians in Africa keeping Saturday. pp. 425, 426.

Coming to the time of the reformation he finds all the leading reformers speaking plainly and very decidedly on the Sabbath question. They all held that the Jewish Sabbath was abolished and that Christians should keep the Lord's day. pp. 433-446. Elder Andrews says. "It is worthy of notice that at least one of the reformers of considerable prominence—Carlstadt—was a Sabbatarian..... The Sabbatarian principles of Carlstadt, his intimate connection with Luther, his prominence in the early history of the reformation, and the important bearing of Luther's decision concerning the Sabbath upon the entire history of the Protestant Church, render the former worthy of notice in the history of the Sabbath." "Hist. Sabbath," pp. 446, 447. "Of Carlstadt's scholarship and of his conscientiousness, D'Aubigne speaks thus: '"He was well acquainted," says Dr. Scheur, "with Latin, Greek and Hebrew," and Luther acknowledged him to be his superior in learning.'" "Hist. Sabbath," p. 451.

Here, then, was an able and learned advocate of the seventh day right in the midst of the reformation. His arguments for the seventh day he laid before Luther, who examined them. Here is Luther's decision in his own words: "Indeed, if Carlstadt were to write further about the Sabbath, Sunday would have to give way, and the Sabbath—that is to say, Saturday—must be kept holy; he would truly make us Jews in all things, and we should come to be circumcised; for that is true, and cannot be denied, that he who deems it necessary to keep one law of Moses, and keeps it as the law of Moses, must deem all necessary, and keep them all." Quoted in "Hist. Sabbath," p. 457.

Luther's argument against the Jewish Sabbath is sound, and has never been answered to this day. So, then, the "light" on the Sabbath question was given to Luther, and he rejected it, just as the great body of Christians do now. Then was he an "idolator," a "Sabbath-breaker," having "the mark of the beast?" If this is true of those who reject the Sabbath now, why not also of him? Let our Sabbatarian friends think of this a little, for they all esteem Luther highly. The other leaders of the reformation were likewise familiar with the arguments for the seventh day, but, as Elder Andrews confesses, they, "as a body were not friendly to such views." "Hist. Sabbath," p. 460. These facts show how untrue it is to say that people have been unacquainted with this Sabbath question before.

Next Elder Andrews gives the history of a large body of Sabbatarians in Transylvania, Europe, in the middle of the sixteenth century. One Elder Davidis, a very learned man, was their leader. "There were many Sabbatarians in Transylvania at this time," says Elder Andrews, and then enumerates a long list of men of high distinction who held these views. "Hist. Sabbath," p. 462.) So also he finds Sabbatarians in Bohemia during the time of the reformers. pp. 463, 464. Of them he says: "They were of some importance, and they must also have published their views to the world," for one writer of Zurich "replies to the arguments of these Sabbatarians." So, then, the Sabbatarian arguments are not now for the first time published to the world. This very thing was widely done in the time of the reformation, over three hundred years ago.

In Russia also there were Sabbatarians hundreds of years ago. pp. 464-467. In Germany also, in the sixteenth century, there were seventh-day observers, and "their numbers were such as to lead to organization and attract attention." "Hist. Sabbath." p. 467. In France also there were Sabbatarians, and one of their learned men "wrote in defence of the Sabbath." p. 468. Books and arguments in favor of the Jewish Sabbath are not a new thing in our day. The people were familiar with them three hundred years ago the same as now.

In England Sabbatarians were numerous in the sixteenth century. See "Chambers' Encyclopedia." article "Sabbath." It says they "became numerous enough to make a considerable figure for more than a century in England." Of this time, Mr. Gilfillin, in his book, "The Sabbath," p. 60, says there was then "a great diversity of opinion among the vulgar people and simple sort concerning the Sabbath day and the right use of the same, some maintaining the unchangeable obligation of the seventh-day Sabbath." This controversy, then, over the Sabbath day is not peculiar to our age. Precisely the same ground has been gone over time and again hundreds of years ago. Thus Mr. Andrews himself says: "In 1607, an English first-day writer, John Sprint, gave the views of the Sabbath-keepers of that time, which in truth have been substantially the same in all ages." "Hist. Sabbath," p. 480.

This confession of their champion writer upsets one of the main arguments of the Seventh-day Adventists. They hold that the light on the Sabbath question was reserved in the special providence of God to be brought out as a test in this last generation. Thus Mrs. White claims to have been shown this by the Lord in vision: "I saw that the present test on the Sabbath could not come until the mediation of Jesus in the holy place was finished and he had passed within the second vail; therefore, Christians who fell asleep before the door was opened into the most holy, when the mid-night cry was finished at the seventh month, 1844, and had not kept the true Sabbath, now rest in hope, for they had not the light and the test on the Sabbath which we now have since that door was opened." "Experience and Views," p. 25.

Now the stubborn facts of history, even as presented in their own "History of the Sabbath," show that this statement is not true, for substantially the same arguments which Sabbatarians are now giving the world, have been given over and over again by Sabbatarians for ages in the past. Yet nearly all who are led into keeping the seventh day are led there with the idea that this is a new truth to which the attention of the church and the world has never been called before since the early apostasy in the church. But here, again, all the facts of history are against them.

Again I quote from Elder Andrews: "John Trask began to speak and write in favor of the seventh day as the Sabbath of the Lord about the time" of King James II., 1618. "He was brought out before the infamous Star chamber, where a long discussion was held respecting the Sabbath." "Hist. Sabbath," pp. 480, 481. Here was a man who preached and wrote in favor of the seventh day, and discussed the subject with the most noted men of the realm, more than two hundred and fifty years ago. On page 488 of the "Hist. of the Sabbath" is given a summary of the arguments then used by Sabbatarians. They are precisely the same as those used now by the Seventh-day Adventists. What then becomes of the claim that this is a new truth, and that the light upon it has never been given before?

In 1628, and again in 1632, Mr. Brabourne, "a learned minister of the gospel," wrote a book in defence of the Jewish Sabbath and dedicated it to the king. The king appointed Dr. White, bishop of Ely, to answer it, who says: "Now, because this Brabourne's treatise of the Sabbath was dedicated to his royal majesty, and the principles upon which he grounded all his arguments being commonly preached, printed and believed throughout the kingdom, might have poisoned and infected many people either with this Sabbatarian error or with some other, it was the king, our gracious master, his will and pleasure, that a treatise should be set forth, to prevent further mischief and to settle his good subjects who have long time been distracted about Sabbatarian questions," etc. "Hist. Sabbath," p. 434. Here we find all England distracted about the Sabbath question. Sabbatarian views preached, printed and believed all over the kingdom. And yet this is a new question, come up in our day, upon which the light has never been given before!

Next one Philip Tandy promulgated these Sabbatarian views over the north of England, and held public disputes about them. In 1642 James Ockford "wrote a book in defence of the Sabbatarian views." "Hist. Sabbath," p. 456. In 1650 Edward Stennett wrote another book in favor of the ancient Sabbath. p. 486. Other books on the same subject followed in 1654 and 1671. p. 487. Richard Bampfield was a famous Sabbatarian preacher and writer. He formed a Sabbatarian church in London. "His brother, Mr. Thomas Bampfield, who had been speaker in one of Cromwell's parliaments, wrote also in behalf of seventh-day observance." So says Elder Andrews, "Hist. Sabbath," p. 489. These were far more eminent advocates than the seventh day can boast of in our times, and the question appears to have been more widely discussed then than now. Sabbatarian churches were formed and Sabbath-keepers were scattered over the kingdom.

In the beginning of the present century there arose in England a body of Sabbatarians in many respects very similar to the Seventh-day Adventists of our day. For some reason Elder Andrews omits all mention of these, though they were by far the largest body of Sabbatarians that has ever arisen. They were led by a woman who had visions, as Mrs. White does. Thus I read: "Sabbatarians, or New Israelites, is the name of a religious sect founded by Joanna Southcott." She "ordered the strictest observance of the Jewish law and Sabbath... Her followers, who at one time numbered one hundred thousand, continued till 1831 to observe the Jewish Sabbath." "Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of religious knowledge."

Here were 100,000 people keeping the Jewish Sabbath in England only fourteen years before the Seventh-day Adventists arose in America. And yet Mrs. White says nobody has had the light on this Sabbath question till after 1844. This is a fair illustration of the groundlessness of all these Sabbatarian claims. In the ignorance and simplicity of my youth, when I was ensnared into keeping the seventh day, I knew nothing of these historical facts about these numerous attempts in the past to resurrect that day. And it is so with those who are being led into it now. They honestly think that it is a brand new truth and the grandest movement ever inaugurated in religious reform! I personally and positively know that scores of Seventh-day Adventist ministers are now preaching this theory of the present Sabbath movement, who themselves have never read one single volume of church history of any kind. Only last year I was sent to ten different States and examined their ministers upon this very point, and hence I know. "If the blind lead the blind," etc.

In 1664, over two hundred years ago, the Seventh-day Baptists began teaching that doctrine in America at Newport, R. I. The first church was organized Dec. 23d, 1671. See "Manual of the Seventh-day Baptists," pp. 39, 40. From that time on they industriously taught the observance of the seventh day, both in America and other lands, even as far as China, by preaching, by tracts, books and periodicals, till the religious world was familiar with their views. They were numerous enough to organize a General Conference as early as 1802. See "Hist. S. D. Bap. Gen. Conf.," pp. 15, 238, or any cyclopedia. This was over forty years before the Seventh-day Adventists started. And yet it is now claimed that the world never had the light on the Sabbath question till Seventh-day Adventists rose up to give it. In the light of the above facts, what a modest claim that is! In fact, instead of receiving this "light" on the Sabbath question directly from heaven after 1844, or even by studying the prophecies, as is claimed, the Adventists simply learned it from the Seventh-day Baptists. Thus in their own "History of the Sabbath," I read:

"The Sabbath was first introduced to the attention of the Advent people at Washington, N. H. A faithful Seventh-day Baptist sister, Mrs. Rachel D. Preston, from the State of New York, having removed to this place, brought with her the Sabbath of the Lord. Here she became interested in the doctrine of the glorious advent of the Savior at hand. Being instructed in this subject by the Advent people, she in turn instructed them in the commandments of God, and as early as 1844, nearly the entire church in that place, consisting of about forty persons, became observers of the Sabbath of the Lord.....From this place, several Advent ministers received the Sabbath truth during the year 1844." pp. 500, 501.

The "great new light upon the Sabbath question" which the Adventists found in 1844, was simply the old threadbare arguments from the Seventh-day Baptists, which that people had been giving to the world for over two hundred years! Here is just where they got that doctrine, as Elder Andrews plainly states.

Now contrast with these sober facts the following glowing account of how the Sabbath truth was found by the Advent people. It is from the inspired pen of their prophetess, Mrs. White: "After Jesus opened the door of the most holy (1844), the light of the Sabbath was seen and the people of God were to be tested and proved.....It was represented to me that the remnant followed Jesus into the most holy place and beheld the ark and the mercy seat, and were captivated with their glory. Jesus raised the cover of the ark and beheld the tables of stone, with the ten commandments written upon them. They trace down the lively oracles; but they start back with trembling when they see the fourth commandment living among the ten holy precepts, while a brighter light shines upon it than upon the other nine, and a halo of glory is all around it. They find nothing there informing them that the Sabbath has been abolished or changed to the first day of the week.....They see that they have been trampling upon the fourth commandment of the decalogue." "Spiritual Gifts," Vol. I.-II., pp. 168-165, edition of 1860. Thus she goes on describing how the Advent people found the light on the Sabbath directly from heaven by studying the subject of the heavenly sanctuary after 1844. But the claim is utterly false, as we have already seen. They got the Sabbath from the Seventh-day Baptists, and not from heaven at all. The controversy over keeping the Jewish Sabbath is not new, but old. All the main arguments now being presented in favor of the seventh day have been familiar with the religious world ever since the days of Luther. They have been examined, rejected, and refuted time and time again by the best men the church has ever had, from Luther down. Those who are now being led into this doctrine with the idea that it is some new light are simply being misled.

WHAT WE CANNOT DO.

We cannot accept a money stipulation, whether ten dollars or ten thousand dollars, to insert a series of articles in THE RESTITUTION advocating a theory concerning our Redeemer that demands, in the very outset, that we expunge whole chapters from the evangelical histories, and that, even when this is done, flatly contradicts a multitude of plain statements left in other parts of the divine record that God has given us concerning his Son. Eternal life is to us a matter of such momentous importance, that we must feel most perfectly assured, that the person from whom we expect to derive an endless existence, is possessed of a nature to impart this, the most transcendant of all gifts. To have life everlasting we become possessed of the attributes of immortality and incorruptibility, and, as these are divine attributes, we must be make "partakers of the divine nature" ourselves in these respects. Now nothing is stated with more emphatic clearness than the fact that these attributes and this nature are derived from and inhere in a personage who is himself spiritual, heavenly, and divine. See 2 Peter i. 4, and 1 Cor. xv. 48–50.

To demonstrate the necessary connection that eternal life, as a bestowment, has, with the fundamental doctrine, that Jesus Christ is the SON OF GOD, we quote only a few passages:

"These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name." John xx. 31.

"And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." 1 John v. 11, 12.

If these solemn statements mean anything, they unequivocally demand, as a condition of attaining eternal life, that we shall believe unreservedly that Jesus Christ is the SON OF GOD. If persons are willing to incur the displeasure of God, and hazzard the loss of eternal life, by endeavoring to prove that he is only the natural Son of Joseph, we cannot help it. Our faith in the holy inspired records is not an article on sale at any price—God helping us—neither are the columns of THE RESTITUTION for the purpose of propagating such gross fundamental errors.

HEALTH better than it was a week ago. Time will determine whether we can attend the Conference at Watson, Mich., or not. Railroad connections are not very good, and we may deem it unadvisable to encounter too much fatigue.

IN writing articles for our paper our correspondents will do us a particular favor if they will give their own views in the spirit of love, concerning the meaning of any particular passage of Scripture, or in regard to any other topic, without any criticism whatever on what some other person may have written. Personal allusions almost invariably give offence. Although we are all liable to err, we none of us like to be made the objects of ruthless censure, or even of gentle fault-finding.

THE following is an Editorial notice written for Words and Weapons, by Geo. F. Pentecost, D. D., in praise of the Pennsylvania line of Railroad, which passes through Plymouth. As the Editor of THE RESTITUTION has passed over the entire line east and west several times, he can say truly that the tribute of praise is well deserved.

"We went west from New York to Chicago on N. Y. Central and L. S. Limited Express. It is a marvel of comfort and speed, but returning from Chicago to New York, we traveled by the Pennsylvania Limited. They have but just put on an entire new equipment of what is called Pullman Vestibule Cars. These cars (there were seven or eight on our train) are made by means of a vestibule on the platform of each car, enclosed by plate-glass doors, and, connected by an ingenious device form one splendid, flexible car, passing from one car to another without going from under cover. The furnishings of these cars are luxurious beyond anything ever put on any railroad in the world. The library car, elegantly furnished, is most popular. A free circulating library furnishes reading matter for the guests without charge; in the hotel car sumptuous meals are served at moderate prices. The barber shop and buffet are additional luxuries. The attendants, conductors and porters are polite and courteous. Indeed, everything that money, art, inventive genius, and best railroad enterprise can provide, is here furnished. The roadbed of this splendid railroad is about perfect, the speed "lightning," and the journey between New York and Chicago, a luxury. We speak impartially, but the N. Y. C. & H. R. Rv., must look to their laurels and appointments, or the Pennsylvania Central Railroad will carry off the passengers."

Will the son of Man, When he Comes, find Faith on the Earth? Luke xviii. 8.

In the preceding verses Christ introduced a parable to the end that men ought always to pray and not to faint, vs. 1; and in the next six verses following he illustrates the same by the familiar parable of the unfortunate widow and the unjust judge, and from the same he deduces the following principle, viz., that the unjust judge, though by his own concession he feared not God nor regarded man, and without regard to justice between man and man, yet because of the importunity of the woman he consented to avenge her of her adversary, and not on the ground of justice or equity; and now God makes this appeal to our sense of justice or to that of those whom he addressed, "And shall not God avenge his own elect who cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them?" Then come the words of the text, "I tell you that he will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless when the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?"

This question at once suggests the idea of doubt in regard to it, to say the least. The elect will be in the attitude of crying or imploring to be avenged of the adversaries with whom they find themselves surrounded at the time of Christ's coming, and although he promised to hear and answer their petition, yet he asks the pertinent question, "Nevertheless when the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?" Christ gave his disciples to understand that during their pilgrimage they would be surrounded by adversaries as their Master had been before them; they being his representatives, and that they must necessarily tread the same thorny path which he had trod. In the context, and in other parts of the Scriptures, Christ was faithful in apprising his followers of the buffetings they would receive from the enemies of the cross, and also of the allurements and enticements to turn their eyes from beholding the mark, "the prize of their high calling which is in Christ Jesus their Lord."

False Christs and false prophets were predicted to arise who would show such great signs and wonders that even the very elect would be deceived if it were possible. In view of all this, is it strange that Christ should make the inquiry that he did? It is axiomatic truth that human nature is the same under the same circumstances. The same inquiry has been the question of all the ages, when the time of Christ's appearing "the second time without a sin offering unto salvation" was contemplated. What kind of faith would be required to meet the crisis? What faith is now required? The length of time intervening does not, nor cannot change the faith. Indeed, the question is more particularly addressed to us who are living in the closing scenes of the great drama, and the opening of the new and grand scene which will cast all the others into the shade of oblivion. The new scene will extend through the untold cycles of eternity. Oh, glorious day! may it soon dawn on this now sin-cursed earth; when sin, "sorrow, sickness, pain and death, shall be felt and feared no more." The faith—the belief of the gospel—the glad tidings concerning the kingdom of God and of his dear Son, is the essential requisite. Yes, and the indispensable requisite in order to salvation and for an inheritance and participation in the glories of this kingdom.

It is not a faith in everything in general and nothing in particular, but the faith in what Christ himself, his apostles, and all his holy prophets since the world (or age) began have taught relative to the restitution of all things, which must of course include the kingdom of Israel under David's greater Son, and particularly what he, Christ, has taught relative to what should transpire at his appearing, and what he should accomplish at that time.

It is not our province to judge in regard to anything before that time, until the Lord comes; but from any standpoint of observation in viewing the professed churches, we have a right to expect from them a true exposition of "the faith once delivered to the saints." But what do we witness? We are compelled by what we see and hear to say that this great central truth, the coming of Christ and the setting up of his kingdom, is, to put it in the mildest form possible consistent with truth, greatly ignored.

M. I. LEWIS.

THE DIVINE—THE HUMAN.

The prince of the apostles, as first chosen—Peter—states this contrast. 2 Pet. i. 19–21. After unfolding the "precious faith" and the sevenfold stages of the Christian life that lead up to the "abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom," he records what he saw with his own eyes and heard in the holy mount, Matt. xvii., Mark ix., and then draws the contrast between the "more sure word of prophecy" and "private interpretation." Please read the text.

"The prophecy" is given of God, to which we do well to take heed as our light in a dark place, till the day dawn, knowing that holy men of God spake as moved by the Holy Ghost, while "interpretation" (epilusis—determination) is "by the will of man!" Thus, the plainest, most essential portions of "the sure word—logos," are taken as determined, by interpretation. "Baptism is ignored for rantism (the word for sprinkling) and babies for believers! "The living soul"—the dying person—is made "the immortal soul!" Yet Lazarus died and was buried (as all die) and was raised to life after four days, John xi.; yet "by interpretation" all such ascend to heaven at death! Brevity is imperative.

The contrast in our text relates to "the day of Christ in his kingdom" as it always comes out in "the sure word" which opens like "the path of the just" from "the dawn to perfect day!" It is never arrested and reversed by "the power of darkness," to give the rulers of the darkness of this world (age) the entire control for a carnival of evil. No, not God has never allowed such a condition. "He is the Lord," and "changeth not" or our sinning race would perish.

Note 1. There are but "four" great Gentile oppressors over Israel and the church—God's people. Zech. i. 18–22; Dan. vii.; Luke xxi. 24; Rom. xi. 25. The fourth, the last, is Rome, with its horn which reaches "the judgment." Rev. xvii. to xix. "Take heed" to it.

2. "How long" is the controlling question. Dan. viii. 11–19; Hab. ii. 1–4; Matt. xxiv. 3; Rev. vi. 10. The answer embraces the sum of history, through two thousand three hundred years.

Note. This cord, 2300 years long, is "the cord" of Gentile time, on which the grand events of all its history are strung! Now assume to break the cord and keep the events! Conceal the "light in our dark place," and float off on a raft of "interpretation!" Deny the confirmation of prophecy which the records of its fulfilment assures and hold your faith! No, no, dear brethren.

3. No prophet of old could speak for God except on the plane and in the line of Moses and the Law. Deut. xviii. Of course no one of our age has authority to teach except in "the light" of God's word by Jesus and his apostles! To which take heed.

4. The Roman Cæsar assumed to be God,—receive adoration and give law to the world. The papacy claimed authority above and over the emperor! Hence, it has its appropriate name, "The mother of harlots." Her paramour is "the man of sin" to perish by the brightness of Christ's coming. 2 Thess. ii. 8. Christ calls his servants out as sanctified and set apart from the world; but the pope and prelates of Rome have claimed what Christ and his people reject. Thus the system of Papacy, with its apostate head is "the antichrist!" It fills the role of "the little horn" of "the beast," the last Gentile power, wearing out the saints, and doomed to end in fire. Dan. vii. 11; Rev. xviii. 8; Jude 7, as Sodom.

Instead of raising questions for doubt let it be our aim to give heed to "the sure word," till the day dawn, to speak as the oracles (logia—wordings) of God! 1 Peter iv. 11. "Interpretation" to the winds. Amen.

"Prophecy" is foretold history, with all its elements in brief; geography, chronology, ten kings, Babylonian harlot and her daughters, much of minutiæ would only number and bewilder.

Our need is faith. Heb. xi. "All things are possible to him who believeth."

Note. "The ages and generations" were ordered by Christ. Heb. i. 2. The second coming for consummation is the goal, the day, the crowning event of the ages! Lovingly for truth and grace.

A Short Catechism.

Will the nations be in existence when Jesus our Lord shall set up his kingdom on the earth?

In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom. When the Son of man shall come in all his glory and all the holy angels with him; then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats, etc. Matt. xxv.

What is the object of this great gathering of the nations?

Therefore wait ye upon me saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey, for my determination is to gather the nations that I may assemble the kingdoms to pour upon them mine indignation, even all mine fierce anger; for all the earth shall be devoured by the fire of my jealousy. For then will I turn to the people a pure language that they may all call upon the name of the Lord to serve him with one consent. Zeph. iii. C. BOARDMAN.

SOCIAL PURITY.

Said an aged Christian man, "I never heard one straight and brave sermon on the Seventh Commandment in all my life."

It may be proper and beneficial for Christian women to traverse the country, lecturing on "Social Purity," and raising what they call "the latest and greatest crusade," but it certainly is pre-eminently proper and beneficial for ministers of the Word to speak out no weak or uncertain tones upon this subject. Only when society is ashamed to sin should we be ashamed to speak of sin.

"The Pulpit
Must stand acknowledged while the world shall stand,
The most important and effectual ward,
Support, and ornament of virtue's cause."

The pulpit must ever lead the van of all moral and spiritual forces. The sanctions of religion are essential. As Paul made Felix tremble when he reasoned of "righteousness, continence, and a judgment to come:" so the preacher of today should make libertines in high places tremble, and public sentiment should lead them down and out.

Let us note that the sins against the Seventh Commandment are more frequently specified and more severely condemned than those against any other commandment of the decalogue, and Christ, in his sermon on the Mount, calls special attention to the searching, spiritual character of this mandate.

The Levitical law (Lev. xx. 10) punished this sin, committed in several ways, by death to both parties. The prophets, again and again, denounced it in bold, bold language, and with divine anathemas. They thundered and lightened against it. The trumpet gave no uncertain sound. Christ and the Apostles were alike explicit and denunciatory, regardless of the prudishness of the pure and the criticisms of the vile. In Gal. v. 19–21 the first four works of the flesh are, "Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, and lasciviousness." Paul declares in Eph. v. 5, that "no whoremonger or unclean person hath any inheritance in the kingdom of God." Jude declares, that for this awful sin in varied forms, Judgment fire came upon Sodom and Gomorrah. John says, in Rev. xxi. 8, that such sinners "shall have their part in that lake that burneth with fire and brimstone." Christ frequently, plainly and severely denounced this sin in promiscuous assemblies, and the Seventh Commandment was the first one specified to the rich young ruler in Luke xviii.

Mark well again, what may be challenged by specialist reformers. Social impurity has been from the beginning, is now, and probably always will be to the end of time, the most prevalent and destructive vice in the world. Sacred and profane history confirms this, in spite of the modest reluctance to put on record these dark and shameful works of the flesh." The Antediluvians, Egyptians, Assyrians, Babylonians, Canaanites—all the ancient nations were corrupted and besotted with social impurity. Greece and Rome in their finest culture and proudest civilization were no better. The vilest impurity was even made a part of religious worship, so Paul says it is "a shame even to speak of the things done of them in secret."

This monarch vice still reigns and ravages in all our modern cities. It caused even good King David to sin with a high hand, closed the life of righteous Lot in guilt and shame, and probably led the wisest man of ancient times into hopeless apostacy, after recording solemn and repeated warnings for future generations. See Proverbs. Its prevalence in Christ's time, even among God's professed people, may be inferred from the self-convicting reticement of every man gathered around the "woman taken in adultery." The civilized world is frequently startled at the discovery of this vice in horrible forms and in high places, as in London. This vice which is the foul and incurable cancer of all modern cities, seems at times to be almost universal among men. There are 80,000 publicly abandoned women in London and perhaps about that proportion in other modern cities. Multiply this by ten for the sum of abandoned men.

God stamps his abhorrence of this sin by affixing to it one of the most painful, loathsome, contagious and incurable of all diseases. The libertine burns and rots with disease, dies and seems to go a diseased ghost to judgment, leaving by the laws of heredity, the burning curse to roll down upon future generations. No other vice seems to be so utterly corruptive and destructive to both soul and body as this, and no other class of sinners quite so hopeless as these.

In view of these facts, let me present some safeguards against this sin of social impurity—

1. Cultivate diligently and prayerfully purity of thought. Beware of a lawless and an impure imagination. Keep the soul, body and spirit pure, and secure the beatitude of Christ upon those who "are pure in heart." Be warned by the Savior against even the lustful look, and let the "young man cleanse his way by taking heed to God's Word."

2. Shun most scrupulously all impure literature, not only what is positively obscene, but what is romantic and exciting to the passion. Parents should be the safeguards of their children here. Even the details of vice given by "reformed men" may be as gross an immorality as a Police Gazette. Anthony Comstock has revealed enough to fill every judicious parent with alarm.

3 Abstain at all times from all uncleanness or indelicate conversation, and rebuke it in others. Paul instructs us in this, (Eph. iv. 29 and v. 3, 4). These are rules for both sexes alike. When an officer in the presence of Mr. Lincoln began a story with a

DAMASCUS.

I have dreamed of the wonderful city,
The Syrian's glory and pride,
Of her beautiful gardens of roses,
Of her palaces fair and wide;
Of the tall and feathery palm-trees,
Where the pearl-mist flickers and gleams;
Of the vines, with their purple clusters,
Overhanging the crystal streams—
The streams, from the snow capped mountains
Which spring at the cedar's roots,
And bring to the thirsty valley
Its treasures of blossoms and fruits.

Damascus, the oldest of cities,
Through the centuries ever the same;
The past, with her story unwritten,
Comes back at the thought of her name!
Here patriarchs and prophets have traveled,
To rest in the shade of her palms;
And kings, with their conquering legions,
Have shaken her walls with their arms.
They drank of these crystalline waters;
But the patriarchs and prophets are gone,
The king and their armies have perished,—
Yet still the Abana flows on.

On the road that leads to Judæa,
I look for that sacred place
Where the Syrian sun, at noon day,
Was dimmed by the Lord-Christ's face.
I see, as the day declineth,
A lifted man led through the gate,
And lodged in the house of Judas,
On the street that is still called Straight.
He came in sorrow and darkness,
Low bowing beneath the rod:
But forth from that hallowed chamber
He went, the Anointed of God.

Damascus! Again shall the glory
Of Christ's face outreal her sun,
And the Kaaba shall arise to salute him,
As he beams on the lands he has won.
The blossoms he coming will nurture
Are sweeter than lily or rose;
And the desert will sing and rejoice,
When the fountain he opens o'erflows.
The night-hooding Covenant shall vanish,
O'erwhelmed in his life-giving rays;
And Damascus, the oldest of cities,
Shall crown him with honor and praise.

A DELAYED ARTICLE.

The article below was sent some time ago for reprint in THE RESTITUTION. We placed the paper away among others which we preserved and forgot what disposal we had made of it. In looking over these papers it has turned up both to our own satisfaction as well as to that of the respected Author.—ED. RES.

THE INFLUENCE OF PAGANISM ON CHRISTIANITY.

It is matter of history, it is evident to all scholars and is openly confessed, that Christian teaching, after apostolical authority was lost, became permeated with the thought of the Gentile nations where it was preached, and in which it made many converts.

Let us notice some of the evidence of this fact. No one can read Bicksteth's history carefully, without being deeply impressed with his statements as to the flood of Platonism which rushed into the pure stream of apostolic teaching, and gave it a heathen hue. Hellenistic Jews had long ago tainted a pure Hebraism. It is said that Philo, of Alexandria, was not only ignorant of the Hebrew language, but also of the Aramaic. This is a significant fact. It should have its influence in making a distinction between Jewish traditions and Jewish faith, which was directed by the ancient prophets of Israel.

Christianity, as preached to the Gentiles by the apostle Paul, was altogether different from that which they themselves taught after the days of the apostles. The heathen, in accepting the gospel, retained to a great extent the belief in which they had been educated. Ammonius Saccas, of the Neo-Platonic school, in the second century, with his Eclecticism, had great influence in tainting the gospel. All these different systems—Grecian and Indian philosophy, came in and were absorbed by the church. Neander, in speaking of the age of Origen, remarks: "There were many partition walls between this age and the apostolic, which prevented a free insight into that age." In King's Primitive Church we read: "The church was gradually spotted and corrupted as to her doctrines, so also in her worship." Jacobs' Ecclesiastical polity of the New Testament furnishes this testimony: "Almost all the doctrines and practices which characterize modern Romanism are to be found, only a little less intensified, in times long before the date of what is considered the commencement of the Papal system; beginning indeed at the end of the second century; making large growth and gaining strength and development in the third and fourth, and numbering among the adherents, expositors and supporters the greatest names in patristic divinity. And consequently a reverent and admiring study of those times, pursued to any length, must exert a powerful, if not irresistible influence in this direction, —an influence which naturally and necessarily lands the captivated student in something scarcely distinguishable from full-grown Romanism, unless the New Testament is placed high and above all other authorities in his mind, and the words and deeds of the best and most honored of men and churches are constantly brought to the test of the Inspired Record, and of the apostolic teaching in the really primitive church."

Again this author remarks: "The church of the apostolic period is the only church in which there is found an authority justly claiming the acknowledgment of Christian bodies in other times; and such authority is found in this church—not because it was possessed of a truer catholicity, or a purer constitution, or a more primitive antiquity, or purity of form, that it confers any right to govern or command; but because it was under the immediate rule and guidance of the apostles; and it is their infallible judgment alone, as exhibited in this church, which has a legitimate claim to our submission.....Nor can the nearness of the early church to the apostles' time be with any effect pleaded in behalf of its authority. For it is not being near to truth and wisdom that makes men true and wise. And there is unquestionable evidence that soon after the apostles disappeared, the church was no longer always guided by the spirit of truth and wisdom; but on the contrary gradually yielded to the seductions of error; was corrupted by its contact with Judaism, Gnosticism and heathenism, and advanced more and more along the downward road of superstition and formality.

"The only difference, therefore, which we owe to church antiquity as distinguished from the inspired authority of the apostles is this,—that whenever good men, either singly or unitedly, have said or done what is right and good, we should love to listen to them, and to tread in their steps; to follow them as they followed Christ. But we must use our own judgment, guided by Scripture, reason and experience, in deciding what is right or wrong, in their words and deeds. I appeal therefore from the Nicene Fathers to the apostles of Christ; from ecclesiastical authorities and practices of post-apostolic centuries to the primitive church of the apostolic age."

In the history of the church, by Martin Ruter, D. D., it is said, when speaking of the second century: "Ammonius adopted the doctrine of the Egyptians concerning the universe and the Deity as constituting one great whole; the eternity of the world, the nature of souls, etc. These sentiments he associated with the doctrines of Plato.....This philosophical system was soon embraced by those among the Alexandrian Christians who were desirous to unite the profession of the gospel with the dignity, the title, and the habit of philosophers.....The rules prescribed by this sect were extremely austere; the people at large were indeed permitted to live conformably to the laws of their country and the dictates of nature; but the wise were enjoined to extenuate by mortification the sluggish body which confined the activity of the immortal spirit, that in life they might enjoy communion with the Deity, and ascend after death, alone and unencumbered, to dwell in His presence forever."

May we not see here the origin of the modern error of going to heaven at death, which has displaced the doctrine of the Advent of Christ and the resurrection of the dead? The idea of the body being but a cage of confinement for the immortal bird is an old heresy.

The introduction of Pagan philosophy into the Christian church is a fact which is witnessed to by scholars of different views. Macaulay in his history of England observes: "At length the darkness begins to break, and the country which had been lost to view as Britain re-appears as England. The conversion of the Saxon colonists to Christianity was the first of a long series of salutary revolutions. It is true that the church had been deeply corrupted, both by that superstition and by that philosophy against which she had long contended, and over which she had at last triumphed. She had given a too easy admission to doctrines borrowed from the ancient schools, and to rites borrowed from the ancient temples. Roman policy and Gothic ignorance, Grecian ingenuity and Syrian asceticism, had contributed to deprave her."

M. Renard, when asked by a reporter to give a brief outline of his English lectures; said that he intended to show "how Rome modified the Jewish Christian church, which was founded by the apostles.....Christianity as we know it is more Roman than anything else. The root was Hebrew; the graft was Pagan.....The Jewish instinct must finally prevail over all existing theologies." "What is the Jewish instinct?" I asked. "Monotheism and a belief in the immortality of the human race and in the renovation of the world." The Jews never much believed in the immortality of the individual soul. They never troubled themselves with the world beyond the skies. They looked forward to a millenarian spring, or restoration, or resurrection; and to the reign of justice upon earth.

Whatever may be the objectionable view of M. Renard, this testimony as to pagan corruption agrees with that of Evangelical Christian scholars and historians; and his testimony as to the Hebrew instinct is certainly valuable. We would call it the Hebrew faith received from Revelation. "What advantage hath the Jew?....Much every way, chiefly that unto them were committed the oracles of God." The Hebrew faith was a resurrection of the dead and a renovation of the earth. It had its illustration in the resurrection of Christ, and the promise will be seen in the splendor of fulfilment in the second coming of Christ.

Dr. Channing, as reported in Miss Peabody's Reminiscences, said "But the Christian Church is an institution by no means produced by the truth which Jesus came to reveal. It is very largely the old Pagan world into which Christ's divine principles fell, and have been all but choked."

Rev. John Miller, in his "Questions awakened by the Bible," says, "What a good thing it would be if all the borrowings from Paganism were set down in a chart.....It is horrible to see the ravages of Platonism. We are occupied with it yet. And it has furnished so much example of the world dominating over the faith, that I need not mention my plea, which is, that it is the commerce with the past that has made men sick into the rut of the soul's being immortal."

The only possible way to discover the truth is to go to the Sacred Scriptures. The very days and months, as named by the heathen, are retained, and Platonism is preached in the name and under the guise of Christianity in almost every pulpit, and to differ from it is considered heresy.

Edward Beecher, in his "History of Retribution," remarks: "No eminent father, and very few if any modern orthodox divines, can be mentioned who have not introduced into their systems the elements of some foreign philosophy, or who are not involved in some form of self-contradiction."

Can we question all this testimony, from so many sources, representing different views, as to the influence of heathen thought upon Christian teaching? O to get clear of Paganism! then we would see primitive Christianity shine forth in her true glory, and tower in templed brilliance. Just in proportion as we clear away the rubbish, will we see the importance of the resurrection of dead men and the coming of Christ in the grandeur of his kingdom.

Let such passages as these have their force as we turn away from Plato and Edward Arnold's "After death in Arabia:" "I have more understanding than my teachers, for thy testimonies are my meditation;" "I understand more than the ancients, because I keep thy precepts,"—Geo. R. Kramer.

Talmage's Sermons.

Are Talmage's sermons the product of Bible inspiration, or man's imagination? We are induced to ask this question by reading his sermon "From the dungeon to the palace," the whole of which seems designed to teach that death is the greatest blessing ever bestowed on man, delivering him from his dungeon state to a state of ecstatic joy and felicity.

Is this in harmony with the teaching of the Bible? We think not.

Death was the penalty for man's disobedience. God told Adam that he must not eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, for in the day that he eat thereof dying he should die. But Adam lived many years after he disobeyed, therefore many say the penalty was not inflicted. But day does not always mean our ordinary day of twenty-four hours. Peter says "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day." Therefore we conclude that the Lord's day is a thousand years, and Adam dying when 930 years old died within the day, and so of all his progeny, none have lived to see a thousand years, or the length of the Lord's day.'

After Adam disobeyed, the Lord pronounced sentence upon him: "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread until thou return to the earth from which thou wast taken, for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." The Bible record of the patriarchs and prophets is they all died except Enoch and Elijah. Not a word or intimation of their being transferred to some other locality to live in either pleasure or pain; and we firmly believe the Lord told the truth when he said that if they disobeyed they should die, and we believe the divine record that they did die, although Satan said: "Ye shall not surely die, but be as gods, knowing good and evil." If this statement of Satan that man should not die, and of Talmage that man does not die, that he is only transferred to another locality, be true, Satan and not Christ is the great benefactor of our race. Had not Satan told our first parents that they should not die, but be as gods, thereby inducing them to eat of the tree of knowledge, they must have remained in their ignorant dungeon state, and would not have been elevated and transferred to a palace.

Christ said: "Satan was a liar from the beginning," therefore we cannot accept his (Satan's) teaching as truth, for we believe the divine record that man did die, that death is the cessation of life, and not a transfer from one locality to another, and if a mediator had not been sent to open the way for deliverance from that death state, man would remain forever dead. In the Bible there is not any promise of a future life save through the resurrection. Paul said: "If the dead rise not, they that have fallen asleep in Christ have perished." Could they be perished if they were not dead, only transferred to live in another locality? No, impossible. We will quote the passage from which Talmage selected his text and see if it teaches and sustains his assertions. "Second Timothy 4th chapter, 1st to 8th verse: I charge thee in the sight of God, and of Christ Jesus, who shall judge the quick and the dead, and by his appearing and his kingdom; preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and teaching. For the time will come when they will not endure the sound doctrine; but having itching ears, will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts; and will turn away their ears from the truth, and turn aside to fables. For I am already being offered, and the time of my departure is come. I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous judge, shall give to me at that day; and not only to me, but also to all them that have loved his appearing." R. V.

Paul does not say that he was expecting to be immediately transferred to glory. He said there was a crown laid up for him which the Lord would give him at that day and also to those who had loved his appearing; and Christ will judge the living and the dead at his appearing and kingdom. Therefore it is very plain that Paul expected his crown at Christ's appearing and not at death.

Paul admonishes Timothy that the time would come when the people would not endure sound doctrine, etc., and no doubt he had reference to the present time, for in the third chapter of this epistle he describes the state of the church and world in the last days of this dispensation. This is an age of fiction, a large portion of the publications of the present day are fictious, the product of man's imagination; and fiction takes better than facts with both the world and church, and there are few persons who will take the trouble to examine God's word to ascertain what is truth. By comparing Talmage's sermon with the Bible we are forced to the conclusion that his discourse is the product of his imagination and contrary to the teachings of the Scriptures of truth.—S. Harper, in Otsego Farmer.

The Servants and the Pounds.

Did it ever strike you that this nobleman had a very kindly design toward his servants? Did this nobleman give these men one pound each with the sole design that they should make money for him? It would be absurd to think so. A few pounds would be no item to one who was made a king. No, no. It was as Mr. Bruce says, "He was not money-making but character-making." His design was not to gain by them, but to educate them. This nobleman said to himself, "When I am a king I must have faithful servants in power around me. My going away gives me an opportunity of seeing what my servants are made of. I shall thus test their capacity and industry, their honesty and their zeal. If they prove faithful over a few things they will be fit to be trusted with greater matters." The test was only a pound; and they could not make much mischief out of that, but it would be quite sufficient to try their capacity and fidelity, for he that is faithful in that which is least will be faithful also in much. They did not all endure the test, but it revealed their characters.

It was also a preparation of them for future service. He would lift them up from being servants to become rulers. They were, therefore, to be put in a place of measurable responsibility, and to be made men of thereby. They were to be made rulers over a very little—say a pound—and that which came of it, and this would be an education for them. In the process of trading they would be in training to rule. For see, when he came to the man who had earned ten pounds, he gave him ten cities. Think of that! There is no proportion between the poor service and the rich reward. A pound is rewarded with a city.

The rewards of the millennium will evidently be all of grace, because they are so incomparably beyond anything which the servants' earnings could have deserved. Their Lord was not bound to pay them anything; they were his bond-servants; but what he gave them was of his overflowing grace. I do not think that he who brought five pounds was in the least blamed. He may have been just as diligent as the other, but he had less capacity. But how he must have opened his eyes when his master gave him five cities. Perhaps he wondered more than the first. All the vessels will be full, but they will not be all equally large; the man of the ten pounds will simply be a larger vessel, full to the brim, and the man with the five will be less capacious, but quite as full, to his own glad amazement and joyful bewilderment. However, let us go in for winning the ten pounds if we can. For our Lord's sake let us trade in spiritual things with all our hearts.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Time for Self-Culture.

It is asked, how can the laboring man find time for self-culture? I answer that an earnest purpose finds time or makes time. I seize on spare moments, and turn fragments into golden account. A man who follows his calling with industry and spirit, and uses his earnings economically, will always have some portion of the day at command; and it is astonishing how fruitful of improvement a short season becomes when eagerly seized and faithfully used. It has often been observed, that those who have the most time at their disposal profit by it the least. A single hour in the day, steadily given to the study of some interesting subject, brings unexpected accumulations of knowledge.—Dr. Channing.

Nearly twenty years ago the true site of Calvary was advocated by Mr. Fisher Howe, of Brooklyn, to be on the north of Jerusalem, at the mound of Jeremiah's Grotto as Golgotha or the Kranion. At the same time the identification was favorably entertained by Dr. Charles S. Robinson, of this city, at that moment revisiting the Holy Land. Since then the theory has received other supporters, who have not, however, added materially to the considerations which were originally brought forward in its favor. Two of the latest converts to this view are the late General Gordon, of heroic memory, and Professor Edward Hull, of the recent expedition to Arabia Petræa and the valley of the Southern Arabah. While it is putting the matter too strongly to say that this site "is now generally regarded as Mount Calvary," the Professor's own words will serve to show how the locality wins its partisans.

"Looking across the domes and flat-roofed houses, crowded together, and beyond the Damascus Gate towards the north, there may be observed a low, flat-topped hill, usually covered with grass; and breaking off in the direction of the city-wall in a cliff of limestone rock. A cave, known as 'Jeremiah's Grotto,' where the prophet is supposed to have dwelt when penning the Book of Lamentations, has been hewn in the face of the cliff. The hill is the property of a Sheikh, and its summit is used as a Moslem burying-ground. Unprofaned by any structure, secular or sacred, this platform 'without the Gate,' and overlooking the city from the north, as Olivet does from the south, is now generally regarded as Mount Calvary. For myself, I feel confident that this is so. Seen in certain directions, the rocky platform bears a not unfanciful resemblance to a skull, which may have given to it the name of 'Golgotha.' It lies beyond the gates of the city, and an ancient Roman road has been discovered to lead from the precincts of the temple in this direction—probably that by which the Savior was led to Calvary. No determination carries with it more interest, or certainty, than that of the place of crucifixion."

By "the precincts of the temple," Professor Hull means the north-west angle of the Temple Area occupied by the Prætorium, or Herod's Judgment Hall.—The Independent.

OLEANDER, Cal.

Dear Restitution:

I notice with interest and joy all attempts to organize effort in the spread of the glad tidings of life through the Son of God. I, too, long to preach the good news of the kingdom, but, knowing that very many of the called, chosen and faithful are, like myself, poor in this world's goods, and being hampered by business connections entered into for the purpose of providing for my family things honest in the sight of God and men, I have supposed it were impossible to obtain the needed means to enable me to devote my time to preaching. So I have kept silent. But when I read of the call for laborers, when I see the fields white for the harvest, when I go to hear professed gospel preachers who are blinded by the errors of the apostasy and see how the people are feed on husks while our Father's storehouse is full of rich food for the hungry, ready for their use if only the shepherds would give it to them.

Oh, my heart burns within me, and I long to give all my time, all my energies to this work. My heart is full of love and pity for the erring, the blinded, the famishing, the dying men and women around me on all sides. Starving, but not for the food which perishes—this is a land of plenty—but for the bread which comes down from heaven. But how can one who has a wife and five children, all young and non-productive of material needs, who has no money except as earned slowly by daily toil, to feed, clothe and educate these dependent ones, how can such an one go out and preach the word in a land containing but a handful of brethren?

I have a little country store here but am partly in debt for my building and my stock. It is a good location, in the very midst of the fruit and raisin industry which makes this part of our State famous already. My store is situated between and about one hundred yards distant from two packing houses and fruit driers. Last season the Curtis Fruit Company, which owns one of them, put up 23,000 boxes of raisins, and this year the two institutions together will probably put up 50,000 boxes! This gives employment to many man, women and children at fair wages. It is a new but prosperous neighborhood, all the while improving. We have either a family or young bachelor living on nearly every twenty acres. We are nine miles south of Fresno and five west of Fowler, and have most of the conditions necessary for a good country business. We have a good school house and a postoffice, and with the exception of about three months of hot weather (in June, July and August) a very fine climate indeed. Eastern people are usually delighted with it.

My house is new, worth about $1500, stock and fixtures $500 more. Hence $2000 is about what I consider my place worth as I have it now. With an additional $2000 the place and business can be put in fine shape for a comfortable home and moderately remunerative income for one or two small families. The postoffice, which can be had in the store if desired, pays now $10 a month and would draw trade besides. Now if some brother who has the capital and a taste for mercantile life in a humble way in the country will join me or buy me out possibly I can devote more if not all my time to the ministry or gospel preaching. I have been lecturing in the school house on Life and Death and trying to interest and instruct the people. Considerable interest has been manifested.

Perhaps I should say that I was educated at Amherst College, Mass., (class of 1870) and was for a time in Auburn Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y., that I preached for a short time among the Presbyterians and then for some seven years among the "Disciples," but that, seeing the way of the Lord more clearly in reference to the life eternal and the gospel of the kingdom, I was baptized on the confession of this faith by Brother Richard Corbaley in Yolo County, Cal., in 1878 or '79. Since then I have been isolated from brethren a good deal but have been giving myself to reading and the study of God's word as I have had opportunity, never neglecting to speak a word in private or in public as occasion occurred if I could aid a fellow mortal or honor my Father in heaven and our elder brother Jesus of Nazareth the Christ of God and our only true life-giver.

I have thus hastily told you of myself and how I wish to give myself wholly to the gospel work. Do you know of any way to accomplish this end? Or do you know of any brother who would trade for my store or go in with me in such an enterprise. My idea would be, so far as I am concerned, to make the store only a means of support while I gave myself mainly to preaching and teaching the word. We have a few brethren and sisters here but no regular organization. Brother Benj. Wilson is here, two Brothers Balch and Brother Calder and their wives, about a dozen of us in all. Circumstances have made it out of my power to do more than speak to them and others who were interested to come and hear. There are causes not necessary to name here which have operated to prevent any attempt at organization, but which I hope soon will be removed. If you see fit to state my case in an abbreviated way (what I have written is too long and rambling to print) in THE RESTITUTION, I would like to see if the Lord may by such means open a door for me. I am with much love

Your brother in Christ,
H. B. RICE.

Future Events.

Are the details of coming events revealed in the Bible? We think not.

For while Paul in his letter to Timothy gives the state of the professed church in the last days, and James tells of the weeping and howling of the rich who have heaped up treasures in the last days; and Daniel who says there shall be a time of trouble such as never was before. Yet it is not stated how or by whom these things will be brought about, but we are commanded to watch, watch passing events, compare them with the prophecies, then shall we be able to form a more correct judgment of what is before us, and be the better prepared to meet it. I do not think the prophecies are all fulfilled, yet I am not expecting a personal antichrist to arise before the Savior comes, but think there will be a federation of kings with the Czar of Russia at the head, which will materially change the attitude of affairs in the east.

I desire to keep clear of dogmatism, and being wise above what is written, because it leads to confusion, strife and division of those who ought above all others to be united in publishing to a dying world the good news of the Deliverer soon to come and make all things new.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "8" and reads "Jny8" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1888. "Feby" February, "Mar" March "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

Will you help us by getting one or two Trial Subscribers?

THE ANGEL'S SONG.

A Reply to "O, Angels, Sing for Me."

Heart of weakness, heart of fear,
Wherefore hearkest thou death's primeval
Veil thy sadness, calm thy fear,
For thy Lord he is not here,
He is risen.

Ravening hell* hath now no dread.
The tomb is empty, come and see;
Christ hath risen from the dead,
Gone before you as he said,
To Galilee.

Bear the joyful message free,
Cheer the children of despair;
Where he said, there shall he be,
Haste them on and they shall see
Jesus there.

ON A MISSION TO THE LAND OF MY FATHERS.

The Committee of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews, having a desire to find out the spiritual needs of the Jews in Palestine through their own representative, instructed me to undertake this Mission, and to report to them from personal observation. Charmed with the prospect of treading those holy fields most precious to every Jew, and objects of veneration to every Christian, I gladly undertook the responsible and yet delightful task. The anticipation of visiting the homes, and preaching the Gospel to my brethren in Palestine was a prospect of peculiar delight, for which I thanked God with all the powers within me. After a brief sojourn in Rome, Naples and Brindisi, we proceeded at last at the Austrian Lloyd's steamer enabled us, to Alexandria.

After a most enjoyable voyage on the lovely, blue Mediterranean for a little over three days, we were charmed when beholding the pilot boat nearing us to take us into harbor, through the complicated channels of the Western Old Port, which are beset with shoals and reefs. At last, thank God, we reached the harbor in perfect safety. The view of land on right and left was most interesting. In the distance we recognized the grand Pillar of Pompey, a splendid monument recalling a thousand memories. As we landed, strange feelings of awe came over us, as we exclaimed: "We are now in the land so famous in history! The land distinguished for its civilization and powerful monarchy, when the father of the faithful 'Went forth from Ur of the Chaldees to go into the land of Canaan'" (Genesis xi. 31). It was in great splendor when the patriarch's sons were there in wretched slavery. It saw its best and most brilliant times when David and Solomon reigned over the chosen tribes. Egypt, home of some of the grandest heroes with whom the world has ever been honored. Wonderful land! the attraction of the Roman conquerors, the desire of the Persian and Macedonian warriors. Egypt, home of some of the finest philosophers from Greece. Egypt, land of delightful meditation to saints, such as, Athanasius and Origin, who delighted to dwell there. Land of the Pharaohs! how inspiring a view of that land, when recalling the most thrilling event in the history of the infant Savior, when Joseph "Arose and took the young Child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt, and was there until the death of Herod, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, 'Out of Egypt have I called My Son.'"

Having got safely landed and comfortably settled in the hotel, and after some rest and breakfast, we went out to ramble about the streets of an oriental city for the first time. Curious, indeed, to us, was the sight of many half-naked Arabs and others, in costumes so unfamiliar to a European. There were garments and turbans of many colors. The dervishes had on high light caps. The faces of the women were covered with black veils, showing their eyes only. Maidens were carrying earthen vessels upon their heads with dignity. Mothers were carrying their children on their shoulders, reminding us of the descriptive prophecy of Isaiah xlix. 22: "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will lift up Mine hand to the Gentiles, and set up My standard to the people: and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders." Still more strange and interesting was it to see other women tenderly carrying their offspring upon their sides, charmingly reminding us of the words of Isaiah lxvi. 12, "For thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream: then shall ye suck, ye shall be borne upon her sides, and be dandled upon her knees."

We visited Pompey's Pillar, which stands on a splendid eminence. Obelisks and ruined fragments of ancient deities lie scattered over the plain. Beholding these gods, made by the hands of men, in shapes most revolting and disgusting, we were constrained to remember the words, "How are thy gods fallen, O Egypt. Against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment."

Not having sufficient time to make acquaintance with Jews in the ordinary way, I went to the synagogue during the time of morning service. After witnessing the evident want of earnestness in their devotional exercises, I entered into conversation with an elderly man, with whom I remonstrated for the want of reverence in the house of prayer, to which he pleaded guilty, but excused himself thus: "We have no temple, and no sacrifices, and no priest," and worship in this place could not be of such great importance as in the ancient sanctuary. After some further conversation, I reminded him of the words of Israel's greatest Teacher and Prophet, "God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth" (John iv. 24).

After spending a couple of days in Alexandria, we started for Cairo: a journey of about four and a half hours by rail, a distance of 130 miles. The ride is intensely interesting. Objects of considerable curiosity constantly meet the eye. Passing through the different stations, we found boys and girls flocking with their earthen jars, offering the thirsty traveller a refreshing draught of cold water; men and women thrusting their oranges into the carriages for prices which seemed to us ridiculously cheap; and half-naked children and adults holding out their dirty hands, and asking for baehshiah; and as I responded to the requests of some, and gave them small gifts, I could not help exclaiming: "Here am I, a descendant of the race that once was in slavery in this land, oppressed by these people; but now how different! Now they humbly beg and gladly accept baehshish from me!"

At last we arrived in Cairo. Having found our way to a comfortable hotel, we hastened to visit such places of interest as Cairo offers. The narrow streets with their strange irregularities told us that we were in a truly oriental city. The bazars, mosques, the strange exteriors of the houses, all help to impress upon the mind the strangeness of the Arabic style. A visit to the Mosque of Sultan Hassam is worthy of undertaking. Its lofty and beautifully ornamented porch, the rich coraise of its towering walls, its minarets, and the arches of its spacious court, are most interesting and instructive. The mosque is considered by the Ostrecns as superior to all others. It is said that when the architect completed this edifice, the king ordered his hand to be cut off, so that he might never be able to build another like it.

After visiting the tombs of the Caliphs of Egypt, of the Bahrite Mamlook Kings, the Baths, Pyramids, etc., we visited the Jewish synagogue. Here we found a number of Jews, who were most willing to show us everything sacred to them. We freely conversed with them on the "Hope of Israel," to which they listened with respectful attention.

Our object being to reach Palestine as soon as possible, we took train to Ismalia, and thence by boat through the Suez Canal, and arrived in Port Said in time for the boat to Jaffa.

The steamer for Jaffa was crowded with Jewish pilgrims, who were on their way to the Holy Land. Many of those were from Russia, Poland, Austria, Spain and Portugal. Soon I found myself in conversation with some, with whom I was delighted to be able freely to speak of Moses and the prophets and, above all, Christ—the Greater than Moses. How charmed I was to find that some of those sons of Abraham had already heard the Scriptures expounded by our noble missionary, Dr. Ben Zion of Odessa. These Jews seemed perfectly acquainted with the Messianic passages of Scripture. It was most interesting to me to listen to some of them as they rehearsed the story of the Crucified Redeemer, which they had learned from our dear missionary. Having provided myself with some portions of Scriptures and tracts, I distributed them; and some offered payment for these gifts. Several shook hands with me, repeating the old Jewish blessing: "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace."—Isaac Levensohn, in Jewish Herald.

The Annual State Conference of the Church of God of Michigan will meet at Watson, Allegan Co., Thursday, Sept. 29, 1887, and last over the following Sunday (the Lord willing). Able speakers will be with us from abroad. We are hoping to have a general rally of God's people present and try, if possible, to beat the record of the June conference, for if we are doing our duty we are growing in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Sacrifice, if necessary, that ye may be with us. We earnestly hope and expect all who are able will come and come with hearts full of love, souls full of prayer and lips ready to speak forth the mighty songs of deliverance through the Almighty God, as good old David of old, and especially those chosen on the different committees, as we have considerable important business to attend to.

Those coming from the north will leave Grand Rapids at 11:35 a. m., change cars at Monteith, reaching Fisk's Station at 2:30 p. m., where they will find welcome friends to meet them. Those coming from the south step off at Martin, where the brethren will meet them Thursday and Friday at the three o'clock trains.

THE COMING AGE,

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It puts out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the UNSEEN AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, in preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Wherever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

MICA PEN-NOTES.

Now let us look at the facts of every day life. I know, or think I know, what is the matter with many people. It is their need of being comforted a little. What almost resurrection power there is in a word of sympathy and encouragement, at the right time! How many, even of God's beloved children are discouraged with the weariness and monotony of life! Some live in isolation and obscurity. Some struggle with poverty. Some suffer with long continued ill health. Many are ardently longing for sympathy and friendship. They feel almost forgotten and forsaken. They are familiar with disappointment and discouragement; they are buffeted with temptations and reverses. If some one only cared for them, if some one knew and noticed their hidden heart sorrow, some one that was good and kind and strong! And yet, poor tired hearts, you are the ones that God pities. And he is strong, and kind and good, strongest and kindest of all.

Ah, but you say, "how do I know that God pities me? Why am I so unfortunate, and so unprosperous, and so tempest-tossed, if God pities me? Let me tell you. God gives you, in this life, the honor, the distinguished honor and opportunity of trusting [illegible] Suppose you were living [illegible] age, when you could [illegible] were walking [illegible] only, and not specially by faith. You could never, no, never, attain such honor and renown as you now can, by believing God who is invisible, and I suppose never could glorify him as you now can. Think of it, over and over. Dear heart, do you not know and consider that God does pity you, pity you sincerely and deeply? Why should you not remember that he is everywhere present, that he is daily and hourly where you are, knowing and noticing every pain and every sigh? If he should speak to you audibly, it might either terrify you on the one hand, or impair your privilege, and interrupt your perfection of faith on the other. It is a grand thing, it is intelligence, it is learning, it is accomplishment to believe in God. Some day this kind of intelligence will outshine all the glory and all the penetration and erudition of science, and the mastery of mysteries in nature. Mastery of mysteries? No, science with all its power and progress, cannot master mysteries. But even if it could, the glory of faith is greater, and the one who simply believed God in the darkness, believed him calmly and strongly in trials and griefs, will be noticed, will be summoned forward, will be singled out for commendation.

I seem to hear a voice from the excellent glory, saying, "This is my child, who trusted me." With what a smile and look of recognition—that will be heaven—is it likely that will be said! It will be worth worlds. And let me tell you right where you are, that in your very time of tribulation, suffering one, there is an aspect in which you are actually to be envied. You have the grandest opportunity to exalt the great God by the firmness and fidelity of your confidence in him, by your pious and intelligent patience. We shall see what intelligence is, presently. We shall see what the grades and qualities of intelligence are, and we shall see the intelligence of faith (the mother of precious children), radiant with a glory greater than the intelligence of mere intellectual culture, the knowledge of books and the discipline of schools.

Yes, if angels had envy, (but they have not; they have the tenderest love and sympathy), they might envy you in your financial strait, in your fatigue and weariness of toil, in your bodily disability and pain, and in any and every trouble and trial, wherein your faith may shine like a star, like an electric light, like a diamond. Just consider the probability that in no other age of ages but this, will there ever again be such an honorable and wonderful privilege of faith. Just think, the time is coming when the former things will have passed away. Now, now, is your golden moment, your high hour of possibility. God gives you the honor of faith. Have intelligence, and know your privilege. This is what the martyrs did.

I said you should know and consider how truly God pities you. And who is he that does so? It is the King of glory, the father, the author, the fountain, the beginning and perfection of all good. From him comes the rose in its aromatic loveliness, from him the bee in its busy life of delving and diving among perfumes and gathering its luscious sweet; from him the dove with its gentle, innocent ways, and the humming bird with its delicate flutter of wings, and its arrowy flash from flower to flower. God is love and truth and preciousness, the sum and substance of all good. And this God is with you, he is surely with you. He says so: "And even to old age I am he, and even to hoar hairs will I carry you." And the grand thing, the grand attainment, the grand science, and the glorious memory, is to know and remember all this goodness and truth and love in God. Cultivate the friendship and acquaintance of the Almighty. Give him your heart, your whole heart, with all your might, without the shadow of a doubt, hesitation or reserve, and glory and rejoice in the gift. Rejoice in the boundless excellence and boundless benevolence of [illegible] great heart, remembering [illegible] mits evil only [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

IF Your Subscription has Expired, Renew Now.

We expect to be absent from home several days, and in making preparation for this purpose, we have not the time to write Editorially for this number. We have just received a book from its author, L. C. Baker, entitled "The Fire of God's Anger," which we will peruse and notice when we return home. It will be almost a sufficient recommendation to all those who have read his work entitled "The Mystery of Creation and of Man," to state that this second work is from the pen of the same gifted author.

FROM the Hebrew Christian we take the first number of a series of articles entitled, "The Story of Isaac Lovinsohn." It was originally furnished for another periodical—"Faithful Words," the Editor of which says:—

"Our friend Mr. Lovinsohn has kindly rewritten his life for our Magazine. The story is of the greatest interest, and shows the wonder-working hand of God in our own day. We trust its perusal will arouse in every true Christian reader a deep desire concerning the salvation of the Jews."

Selections.

Solemn Admonition to Ministers of the Gospel.

But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions, do the work of an Evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry. 2. Tim. iv. 5.

Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or has some one else taught thee? is the interrogation silently addressed to every preacher. Have you convictions, or are you only a vocal memory? Is it a 'paper,' or a message? Is there a reciter in the pulpit, or a man with fire in his bones who is weary if he forbears, and cannot stay from delivering the burden of the Lord? 'It's of no use to preach to me from without,' says Emerson, 'I can do that too easily myself.' Know your message, then. Find it in the Scriptures, in Christ Jesus, and in the life of man. Get it clearly. Fix it in the mind. Speak it with the whole force of the soul, and you will speak as the nun, who, having seen the Holy Grail, addressed the knight,—

"And as she spake
She sent the deathless passion in her eyes
Through him; and made him hers and told her mind
On him, and he believed in her belief."

But it is imperative you should not forget that you are in training, not only for the preaching of the gospel of God, but also and especially for the guidance and upbuilding of communities of men and women whose Sovereign is the Lord Jesus himself, whose rule is the New Testament, and whose basis is that of brotherhood and freedom, independence and equality, spirituality and service. You are to be a teacher in a society of teachers, some of whom have thrice your experience, ten times your faith and sanctity, and a thousand times your consecration. You are a worker in a band of workers who will wait your word as that of a general, and accept your example as that of an authority. Above all, you are the pattern saint in the company of saints, called to be the most self-sacrificing member of a body whose law is self-sacrifice, and the most devoted of the host, whose ideal is one of consecration to God.....

Yet the minister is in no respect a 'priest.' Nothing is so entirely alien to the Christianity of Christ Jesus as the presence of the priest, or so debases and lowers the spiritual life as the superstition of the priesthood. Christ gave apostles and prophets, pastors and teachers, and evangelists, but not priests. You are not intended to be 'clergymen' in any sense. A mere ritual grinding functionary or an automatic phrase-monger cannot discharge your responsibilities. You are not a successor to Aaron, but to Christ and Paul; and your power will depend not on badges of separation, or titles of dignity, or orders of precedents, but on your personal influence,—on what flows from you quietly and strongly into the lives of men; on the quality of your thoughts and ideals, motives and aims, powers and religion.

Take heed, therefore, to thyself, as well as to thy ministry; to thyself, and take heed now. Each day is making character. You are now developing the qualities you will use....in the management of churches. Therefore now (1.) you must conquer self. He who would guide and sway others must be skilled in the art of self-mastery. The violent temper that wrecked a church was left unsubdued at college. 2. Eliminate all self-seeking and pride. By that sin fell the angels from their first estate; and many churches have fallen from the same fault. Whitefield said, 'I cannot buy humility at too dear a rate.' Vinet described the Christian ministry as 'not a profession but a martyrdom;' and it is the hardest martyrdom of all; one in which you bring the fagots of personal ease, and emoluments, and vanity, and set fire to them with your own hand, and whilst the flames are burning around you, lock your lips, lest opening them even in self-defence should bring discredit on the name of the adorable Master. Learn, I beseech you now, how to suffer for his sake. Invite self-denial, if only that you may be training in bearing meekly and with cheerfulness the cross for others. 3. Maintain a strong spiritual life, for fortunately you cannot get on in our churches without some real religion. Not rhetoric, be it ever so glowing; or learning, be it of unequaled extent; or fervor, be it most intense, will suffice, if a glowing spiritual life be absent. Ah! my friend, I know no sphere so inviting to a soul that yearns for the most exalted and loving service of man and God, as that of a pastor of one of our free Christian churches.

With fine penetration, Dr. Bonsor says, 'The elements of this world's life are so numerous, and so infinitely are they blended in every conceivable variety, that it must seem that ere the world ends there will not have been any possible combination of the atoms of trial, privilege, gift, or suffering with which some one human will shall not have been exercised and proved.' That complex, much-embracing world is the area of your strife, the sphere of your service; and you ought not to close your eyes to the numberless contingencies it contains, or the mightily influential certainties it holds. He who would do his work well in life must often look ahead so that he may know the men he is going to talk to and work for; what forces are now making or marring him, what powers are likely to close his heart to Christ, and what to open it; what will give facilities for the richer and wider application of the manifold energies of Christ in Christ, what and will obstruct its full and free use. We need to get at the facts of the world, so that we may know how to commend the gospel we preach to every man's conscience, whoever he is, and make it a good to repentance, a source of fresh ethical inspirations and of wide spiritual reforms."

Do you ask, Who is he that dares accept an ideal of training so exacting, painful, and exceeding broad, conquering body and mind, heart and conscience, will and character, requiring sleepless vigilance, incessant industry, and unflagging enthusiasm?

I answer, Only he to whom Jesus Christ is Master and King; only he who, conscious of his redemption through Christ's sacrifice, delights in offering him a hearty and unabashed enthusiasm, undismayed by a dominant criticism, unchilled by the coldness and opposition of the world: only he who says in the white heat of his devotion, 'To me to live is Christ.' Existence finds in him center and goal, inspiration and interpretation, light life; only he who says,—

"O Christ, the way, the Truth, the Life,
Through whom we find the Father's calm,
And peace from guilty fear and strife,
And knowledge of his holy will,
We come to thee, the Heavenly Road,
We learn of thee, the Truth Divine,
We seek from thee the life in God—
Thou art our all, and we are thine."

It is the choice of the Master that marks and makes the man. Take this low one, and watch him, and you are nothing and achieve nothing. Take that high, divine, best one, and he will uplift, enlarge, and fill out your magnificent ideals; inspire sustained passion for toil, in the place of aggravated failure; give tone to your speech, 'till all the stops of life with tuneful breath,' keep your heart warm and fresh, so 'that, like Paul, you will exclaim after a quarter of a century of unrelaxed toil, still 'one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press on toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.'

Nothing else will suffice to bring every thought into captivity, every power into use, every responsibility into privilege, every duty into delight. Not the church, not theology, not ordinances, not worship, not work; be himself is the heart of all true theology, the life of the church, the key of the ordinances, the spirit of worship, and the power for work.

Therefore the one law of laws in all your training, is that continuous faith in Christ Jesus, prolonged study of his ideas, principles of work, perfect obedience to his example, heart to heart fellowship with his Spirit. This is all in all. Lose sight of him, and you die. Dwell with him in the heavenlies, and earth itself is paradise, labor is joy, and preaching is blessedness. On this hangs all the law of ministerial training.

In our Kensington Gardens one parable has been given of late many times. Among it may be trees clad with beauty in the leafy month of June, some here and there show just a little decay at the top, only discernible by those who look aloft. Near the sight of the gathering crowds, leaves are plentiful and loveliness abundant. The bark is without a sign of decay, the boughs are strong and the form is stately. All is well or seems so; but the winds rise and beat about the trees on a cold November night, and one falls, broken off near the ground; and then it is seen that myriads of tiny creatures have eaten their way through its substance, reduced its fiber to powder, and so removed its strong core. For years it has gone on, from the top downward, and nobody knew it, not even the tree itself. "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye hide in me.....Without me ye can do nothing."—Extracts from an address by J. L. Clifford, LL. B., of England.

THE BIBLE.

What a book! Vast and wide as the world, rooted in the abysses of creation, and towering up beyond the blue secrets of heaven. Sunrise and sunset, promise and fulfilment, life and death, the whole drama of humanity are in this work.—Heine, on the Bible.

A WONDERFUL BOOK.

The "Bible," says Hately Maddell, has been quarry for sculptors, a gallery for painters, a text book for orators, a standard for poets, and a dictionary of quotations for everybody. It was a fountain of melody to Handel, to Mendelssohn, to Haydn; a field of phantasmagoria to Dante; a spectrum of human life to Goethe; a consecrating oil to Shakespeare; a window in heaven and a light upon earth to Bunyan; a mystery of mysteries to Byron, and a pocket companion to Scott."

A book, as well as a man, is known by the company it keeps; and this book has kept the grandest company this world ever saw. Written by men of all classes it comes to men of all conditions, and meets the needs of the universal heart. Blessed are they who have tasted its sweetness and learned its worth, and who can say, "The law of Thy mouth is better to me than thousands of gold and silver."

THERE IS WORK FOR ALL TO DO.

The birds do not sow, nor reap, nor gather into barns; but Christ does not tell us we are not to sow and to harvest. The flowers toil not, neither do they spin; but say one who should follow the example of the lily in this regard would not find himself arrayed in the glory of the lily. Indeed, the very birds whom Christ cites forage, though they do not harvest, and set an example of wise forethought in every recurring season. In autumn, before winter snows have come to hide the food of the bird, he prepares for his flight to warmer climes; in spring, when he returns, he plucks the feathers from his own breast to line the nest for the little ones whose coming love prophesies. The birds and the flowers each fulfil their allotted mission in life; they each do, in the way in which God has appointed, the work which God has appointed; and God takes care of them. If we, in this respect following their example, are doing God's work in our way and place, God will take care of us. He will not keep our feet from falling nor our eyes from tears. Not a sparrow, it is true, falleth to the ground without our heavenly Father seeing it. But he sees many a sparrow fall. All we can be sure of, is this: if our hearts are set to do, or to suffer, his will, he will see to it that we are not disappointed in that.

GOD'S SYMPATHY.

The Heavenly Father gives his sympathy to every soul that struggles toward a higher, better light and life. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled. Hunger and thirst are the only conditions. Every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. He does not give us a golden rule and practice on a silver one. He who says to us, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," connects this counsel—observe that—with what goes before by the little but significant word therefore. Therefore, because God so sympathizes with you, do ye sympathize with others. He puts himself in your place. He takes on him the form of a servant. He does for us what, if he were a man and we were God, he would have us do for him—all that strength can do for weakness, wisdom for ignorance, love for the meaning and restlessness of sin. This is the first great truth; the one truth oftenest dwelt on in the Scripture, oftenest obscured by our poor earthly teaching, and forgotten and disbelieved by us in our extremity: God is more than mother or father in his nobought, unsought, unasked readiness to help whoever desires help to a higher, better, purer, diviner life.

The Central Land.

It is worthy of note that the land of Israel, so long neglected and desolate, occupies a position in the very centre of the ancient world. Palestine, though an insignificant territory, had Egypt on the south, Babylon on the east, Nineveh further north, and Rome further west; so that by drawing a circle extending twelve degrees to each direction, we take in all the great capitals of the ancient world. A little to the north-west on the coast of the Mediterranean, lay Tyre, the Liverpool of the world; while on the north-east was Tadmor or Palmyra, marking the route of the caravans which brought from afar the treasures of the east.

Had Israel been obedient to the commands of God, had they listened to his commandments and observed his precepts, that land thus centrally located, might have been the light and joy and glory of the world. But Israel rebelled against God; and, fallen from their high estate, were scattered amongst all nations, while the land flowing with milk and honey was brought to desolation.

Today the traveller journeying through Palestine looks on with surprise. Out of that land have gone forth influences mightier than any which the world has ever known. From that land have flowed the streams of civilization and enlightenment; law and gospel, morality, and religion have gone forth thence to save and bless the world. The enlightened and human principles that have pervaded the advanced civilization of mankind, and the hopes of life and immortality which bless and cheer the race are traced back to these hills and valleys now so desolate and abjected.

In these facts we see the evidence of the Divine origin and authority of these great principles. There is no other way of accounting for the things that have come forth from this land. There is no other way to explain the prolonged existence of the Jewish nation, the diffusion of the principles of the Mosaic law, or the spread of the gospel of the Son of God, unless it be the fact that a Divine wisdom superintended, and a Divine power wrought out these results.

It is not the land, the climate, the scenery, the mountains, or the valleys that have made the Jewish nation what it is; but it is the law of the Lord which is perfect, converting the soul: the testimonies of the Lord which are sure, making wise the simple.—The Christian.

A Bulgarian Confederation.

I learned yesterday from the very best authority that the movement for a Bulgarian confederation has grown immensely in importance within the last two months, also that some effort to establish this confederation may be made before the cold weather comes. The Hungarians have, it is said, gained a complete ascendancy over King Milan of Servia. During his visit to the Austro-Hungarian Kingdom he has been carefully watched and guarded by the Hungarian aristocracy, and has never been outside of their influence for an instant. The Hungarians now say to Austria: "We have an army of 800,000 men equipped as well as any in the world; we have spent millions upon millions on it and know how to use it; Servia has a compact little army of 80,000 or 90,000 men; Roumania, which will never take the initiative, but which would quickly follow in an attempt to make a Balkan and a Danubian confederation, can put 150,000 men into the field, and justified her boast that her army was good and valiant in 1877; Bulgaria can certainly furnish 100,000 men, and here we have nearly 700,000 good troops sufficient to outlive us to careful consideration." The Austrians fully realize their own weakness in presence of this Hungarian manifestation, and it is said that the Count is greatly perplexed. Of course the one unknown factor in the whole problem would be the attitude of the mysterious Chancellor of the North. He knows perfectly well that the great conspiracy is on foot, and while he smiles at the audacity of these inland States boldly asserting their independence in face of the tremendous power of the triple alliance, he does not say which way he would throw his weight. It is almost impossible to estimate the changes which would take place in European policy within a very short time if this Danubian-Balkan confederation scheme should bear fruit. It would entirely change the attitude of England toward Eastern questions, would be a substantial check to Russia, and would, to my thinking, in the twinkling of an eye upset the triple alliance. The first battle ground would naturally be Roumania, which would be invaded by both Austria and Russia, each hoping to get the vantage ground first, but the consequence of this invasion of Roumania would be so wide-sweeping, would cause such a panic and revolution in Austro-Hungary, with the Hungarians hostile to such invasion, that Austria might disappear in the conflict. Any one who has been through the lately subjected provinces of Turkey within the past few years knows the burning desire for independence which animates nearly all the inhabitants of each principality. If some statesman and soldier combined were suddenly to arise out of the ranks of the people and to carve a grand new State or confederation of States out of Southeastern Europe, he would make more changes in English, Russian, Austrian, German and French policy within six months than have been made the last two generations by any other event. This is not an idle theory; the reports are based on facts, and facts which are kept out of the Continental newspapers as much as possible because of their great significance and the menace which they constitute to the maintenance of the triple alliance.—Edward King.

God's Way.

Oh, the awful grandeur, the mystery, the deep meaning, and the tragedy of our human lives! And these hearts of ours, what curious things they are! How they break in upon the even tenor of our way, and twist and turn us in this direction and then the other! One hour we are high up on the Delectable Mountains, everything is bright, life flows on peacefully and we have come to the land of rest and contentment. Suddenly, we are hurled headlong down into the depths of despondency. Things are not what we thought they were, and everything seems dark and gloomy where once was sunshine and peace. What does it all mean? We are dazed, numbed for awhile. We had prayed that God would purify our hearts. We had hoped that we were growing more like Christ. We fancied that we needed no more discipline, that we would be allowed now to enjoy some of the comforts and pleasures which are in the world and which he has promised shall be ours.

Why then are we here in humiliation? For just this: We have not remembered that "they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." We thought we were seeking first the kingdom and its righteousness, but there were hopes hidden away in our hearts that we might have some of the good this world gave. We had given ourselves to God, as we thought, and we had prayed for holiness. He answers our prayer. How? By showing us to ourselves, by revealing to us how much of the world there was yet in us, and how empty and worthless it all was after all. He thereby draws us to himself, therefore 'tis best that we should stumble because of the surety with which we turn to him who is all fullness and faileth not.

But if we should stumble and fall down, down into the depths of misery and destruction, what a tragedy it would cause in human life. God's dealings with us are so strange! He knows and watches every event in our lives, we who are his. He uses every trifling circumstance, trifling in our short-ranged vision, to mould our character and fit us for the work and wisdom of the other life, when we wish to give ourselves to him.

He sends us trials and perplexities and leads us into hard and dangerous places. He scourges us until we are ready to cry out, "It is more than I can bear." We have forgotten our prayer to be made Christ-like, forgotten that God uses means to accomplish ends, forgotten that trials and tears work out patience, holiness and sanctification. We have failed to see that the weeds must be pulled up from the roots in order to be exterminated, that the fountains of our souls must be stirred to their very depths ere our hearts can become pure and holy. He uses the very opposite means to accomplish his ends to those we would use were we to mark out the discipline. If he would make us strong, he sends opposition and criticism and many stumbling blocks; if patient, irritating circumstances, petty cares, and thorns in the flesh; if we are to become resigned to his will, and are to be made holy and sanctified, "a peculiar people," it is by the thwarting of all our bright hopes, the denial of this world's happiness, and the almost constant envelopment of clouds and darkness. 'Tis his way.

Thus our lives go on; we live and learn and suffer it out, and the greater our desire for purity and holiness, the thicker and faster the trials come, for only thus can our prayers be answered. Men and women cross our path, they grow into our lives, they teach us our lessons as we too teach them. Then they drift away, their mission to us fulfilled. Other lives perhaps take their places and finish or perhaps only add to the work the others have commenced. The drama of life goes on. We learn our lessons, with tears sometimes, sometimes with joy, but oftenest and truest and deepest through tears. Blessed tears, God's safety-valve to bursting hearts. He is so good to us through it all, for we are his children, his very little children. He knows just how much we can bear, and when he sees that we are just ready to sink under the burdens laid upon us, suddenly he sends relief in ways we never would have thought of and could never have planned for ourselves. And we learn that "all things work together for good to them that love God," to them that are the called according to his purpose.

He lets us make mistakes that we may learn how little wisdom we have, but does not charge them to our account because "he knoweth our frame," but only considers that we were trying to do his will. He will not allow us to be plucked from his hand but will lead us, even weak and bleeding as we are after our many encounters, into the rest that remaineth for the people of God.

Look him then to take you just as he wills you to will and to do of his good pleasure. He expects us to give ourselves to him. He says, "My son, give me thine heart;" not a hand or a foot or some little part of thy life, but "thine heart." "Out of the heart are the issues of life." All the ambitions, and all our hopes must be given up, willingly, without regret, we must be crucified together with him, our hearts emptied of self. It comes not all at once, but gradually, imperceptibly, God's grace comes stealing in upon us and we find it easy to do what once we could not, with so much selfishness in our hearts, be willing to do. We must believe as Christians, that God orders all of our life, not a part of it, not that some things we bring upon ourselves, and that some are sent by him, but that every circumstance incident to our daily life is under his control and governed by him. We are not wise enough to even discriminate as to which came from him or which was the result of our own errors or wisdom. We can draw the line but leave it all to him who cared for us.

We must aim higher—live higher. We must learn that all the world contains is not worthy to be weighed in the balance with the honor and glory and peace which those attain who gain "the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

Let us seek the things which bring us into a clearer knowledge of how God means us to live in this life rather than to be wise in all the doctrines. It is not how much we know but how much we live, how much we love and help we give our neighbor. We are to learn how to curb violent tempers, to be charitable toward those who do not think just as we do, to avoid evil speaking, to be gentle and patient and forgiving as our Savior himself was. It implies for us, submission to God's will in all things, and the keeping of a tight reign upon ourselves. But we are living for him if we do, and we can smile even through tears, seeing that the end is so well worth the winning. "We shall be like him for we shall see him as he is" and "we are made perfect through suffering."

"Until that Day that I Drink it New"

The word "new" suggests the idea of that which is fresh, and pure, grape juice newly pressed out. It is this that Christ will drink with us at his table in the kingdom of God.

We take the cup at the sacramental feast to symbolize the crimson stained side that Jesus shed to take away our sins. This cup must be filled with new, pure grape juice or it cannot represent that blood. His blood takes away sin. In it is life. The blood is the life. Through the shed blood we have hope of future life.

That which has in it the seeds of decay and death cannot typify the blood. There must be no ferment, no leaven in the cup. Christ is our Passover, our sacrifice. All leaven was put away at the time of the Jewish Passover; "the blood of the sacrifice must not be offered with leaven;" "no leavened bread must be eaten." Reasoning from these facts, we would put away all leaven from our sacramental feast.

We think of sin, of hypocrisy, of wickedness, when we use the word "leaven." Paul says we are to "purge out the old leaven," meaning sin.

"Chomits," leaven, is used to signify "sick or sour wine." That which has in it anything that typifies sin, will not do to typify the sinless blood of Christ. Let the cup be filled with the pure, unfermented juice of the grape. A Baptist lady said to me the other day "that the wine used at church which she attended was detestable; it always flew right to her head." I have been thinking our conversation over, and with the above result. The consequences of using anything but pure, unfermented wine, might in some instances be terrible. Let us not put temptation in the way of those for whom our dear Savior gave his life.

Unsuccessful Workers.

Despondling Christians do not make successful workers or valiant soldiers. "Feeble-Hearts," and "Ready-to-Halts," and "Little-Faiths," will not battles, and wear no crowns. They are so occupied with themselves, with their own experiences their own evidences, their changing moods and feelings, that they have no time for manly, noble service. They are so busy in trying to perform "acts of faith;" and having performed them, they are so intent upon analyzing them, in order to ascertain what or they be all of the exact quality or quantity which will recommend them to God, that they leave no space for "joy in believing" and no room for the free, large-hearted labor which such joy cannot fail to lead us to. Tossed up and down on the waves of unbelief and fear, they have no heart to work. Shutting their eyes against the light, they grope their way uncertainly, and cannot run the race. Afraid to believe, but not afraid to doubt; afraid to trust, but not afraid to distrust; doubting themselves, and making that a reason for doubting God; putting away peace, and giving full scope to gloom; refusing light, but letting darkness reign within them; they are not in a condition to do hard work—nay, to do any work at all. Strength comes from joy, and of that joy they have none. They refuse both food and medicine, and they become lean and sickly. They are fitter for the hospital than for the battle-field. They seem, too, to get more and more emaciated, though the food provided is abundant. Laboring under what physicians call atrophy, the more they eat the less they seem to be fed.—Bonar.

The sheep are led by many a way—sometimes through sweet meadows, sometimes limping along sharp-flinted, dusty highways, sometimes high up over rocky mountain passes, sometimes down through deep gorges, with no sunshine in their gloom; but they are ever being led to one place, and when the hot day is over they are gathered into one fold, and the shining sun sees them safe, where no wolf can come, nor any robber climb up any more, but all shall rest for ever under the Shepherd's eye.—Maclaren.

We hope our friends will be prompt in responding to the notices sent out last week. Quite a number have answered the call. We thank you for it. Let each one that received a notice reply immediately.

IN MEMORIAM.

(The following little poetic effusion was composed as a memorial invocation for bereaved hearts over the last resting place of our departed Sister Palmer.—ED.)

NAOMI'S GRAVE.

Savior, bend in lifelong sorrow,
O'er the sacred mound we rear,
Let the tears of thy compassion
Flow upon our loved one's grave.

Pour the balm of holy healing
O'er the wounds that death hath made,
Tenderly, thyself revealing,
Bind them up the broken reed.

Grant to our weak faith, a vision
Of the mansions of the blest,
With the light that shines from heaven
Hallow them Mark's rest.

Help us bow in resignation
To thine ever blessed will,
Help us feel through deepest anguish
Still thou hast done all things well.

LOIS HELEN LITTEL.

Youth's Column.

By him life's morning foretelt be,
Who loved, and lived, and died for thee;
So shall thy noontide never know
Earth's burning thirst and withering glow;
And then shalt fear no gathering night,
At even-time it shall be light.

Beautiful hands are those that do
Work that is earnest and brave and true,
Moment by moment the long day through.

Beautiful feet are those that go
On kindly ministries to and fro,
Down lowly ways if God wills it so.

The Scarlet Thread.

A friend of mine was receiving some money at the hands of a bank officer the other day, when he noticed depending from one of the bills a little scarlet thread. He tried to pull it out, but found that it was woven into the very texture of the note and could not be withdrawn. "Ah," said the banker, you will find that all the government bills are made so now. It is an expedient to prevent counterfeiting." Just so Christ has woven the scarlet thread of his blood into every dollar that the Christian owns. It cannot be withdrawn. It marks it as his.

The Seed is the Word.

The fallow field, if never sown, can bring forth no rich sheaves of golden grain; the hillside if never planted with the vine, will hang no tempting clusters of grapes in the autumn sun; nor can the sunny, southern slope, if the husbandman's hand never sets the trees, lift up its lovely crimson apples to the breeze.

So it is with your hearts, dear children. They must be sown, or no fruits of righteousness will appear in your lives. The field, the hill, the slope, left to themselves, bring forth nothing but unsightly weeds; your hearts, all manner of evil things.

A crop of good fruit cannot be looked for unless good seed is put into the ground. God has given you such seed. It is his own precious word. It will purify you, and make you worthy of a place in the glorious mansions of light, if you will but make it a place and let it grow. You do not want your hearts to be like the wayside, the hard roadbed, where nothing can find lodgment, nor like the stony places, where there is no depth of soil to hold the seed, nor yet like the thorny spots where all the bright plants must be choked out and die.

Then study the language of Jesus, where he says over and over again "the seed is the word." Try to understand that word, "the word of the kingdom" so the wicked one may not catch it away out of your hearts, and when received with joy, become so "rooted and grounded in the truth" that you will not be "offended" and give it up when persecution comes on account of the word, and be careful, lest other things, the cares of life, and the desire to get great wealth, choke down the good seed, so that you will bear no fruit. S. R. WINCH.

THE STORY OF ISAAC LEVINSOHN. No. 1.

I am a native of Russia, and was born in the year 1855 in the town of Kovno. My parents were pious Jews, much devoted to the glory of God under the Jewish traditions. My father fasted every Monday and Thursday, with the object of mortifying the flesh, and in order to justify himself before God, who has said, "Ye shall be holy; for I am holy," Lev. xi. 44, and "Thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God," Deut. xviii. 13.

It was my father's wish that his children should be brought up in the fear of God, and especially that his sons might be devout Jews. My elder brother did not wish to follow the desire of his father and become a Rabbi, as he preferred the study of foreign languages, science and philosophy. He entered the college in Kovno and finished his studies at Gradno. Seeing his eldest son give so much time to the world did not at all satisfy my [illegible] and [illegible] a devout Jew, under the teaching of a Rabbi full of zeal and piety.

When I was five years of age, my father began to instruct me in Hebrew. He read the prayers of the Liturgy every morning, afternoon and evening, and informed me that if I did what the Rabbi wished and obeyed him in all things, and also prayed three times a day, God would be very pleased with me.

The idea that God would be very pleased sank deep into my heart. I tried to do everything that my parents, and especially my Rabbi, wished me to do, respecting the great law in the Bible, "Honor thy father and mother," and also the words of the Oral law, "The fear of the Rabbi is as the fear of the Lord."

When eight years of age, I could read any part in the Hebrew Bible, the Targum, and the great Rabbi Rashi's "Comments on the Bible." My Rabbi began also to instruct me in the Talmud, and gradually led me to give up reading the Bible, as he considered the study of the Talmud was more important. My whole time was devoted to the studying with him in his house, for I was the only pupil he had undertaken to bring up and instruct in the Rabbinic doctrines.

On my tenth birthday, my father invited a few of his learned friends, with the Rabbi who was my teacher, and three others, to examine me. They were to give their judgment as to my qualifications for becoming a minister. The examination was passed through to their satisfaction, which so pleased my father that he gave a dinner to the poor of the synagogue, and asked them to pray to God on my behalf. He also promised me fifty roubles on my thirteenth birthday if I succeeded well in another examination. All this made me more earnest than ever in living a holy life.

About this time serious questions began to arise in my heart, and I asked myself, what is really the Word of God? and, after some reasoning, I came to the conclusion that the Bible must be the book given by God. So I asked the Rabbi if I could devote a little more time to its perusal. But he wished me to occupy myself solely in Talmudic study. However, I spent one hour every night before going to bed, and two hours every morning before prayers, in perusing the Bible alone.

When my thirteenth birthday approached, I was instructed in the articles of the Jewish faith. The Rabbi told me that as soon as I reached thirteen I should be regarded as a man, and should have to be responsible for my sins before our God, Jehovah. This great thought of responsibility for sins filled my mind with solemn thoughts, and led me to enquire earnestly, "What must I do to be saved?"

At the age of twelve years and eleven months, my father took me to the synagogue, and informed me that all the sins that I had committed were upon him: but for all the sins I committed from my thirteenth birthday I should be responsible before God. I entreated him to continue to bear my sins for two or three months longer, as I was afraid that I should very soon sin against the Holy One. But he told me this could not be done. Then I cried bitterly, being perfectly certain that it was an utter impossibility for me to live a perfect life.

The infinite holiness and purity of the great Creator, and the depravity of man's heart, convinced me that there was nothing in me but sin. But there was no way open: my father said I must undertake the responsibility of my sins before God, so I undertook it, and confess that after that day I felt the burden very heavy.

My thirteenth birthday came, and my father took me to the synagogue, where he offered me to the Lord, with prayer, according to the Jewish custom, and thanked God that he was no longer responsible for my sins.

On the same day he invited the Rabbi to his house with several elders of the congregation to examine me in what I had learned since my tenth birthday. They expressed their belief that the God of our fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, had called me to the ministry of the Jewish faith, but I rejoice to know that the God of grace had a better office and much greater honor for me—namely, to be a servant of his in the vineyard of Christ, and to be a priest before the Most High, and to reign with Christ forever. My father and the Rabbi then put their hands upon me, and blessed me, saying, "God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh." Gen. xlviii. 20. The promised present of the roubles was given me, and was distributed among the poor of the synagogue, who were asked to pray for me.

The next [illegible] [illegible] my birthday [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

UNFINISHED MUSIC.

I sat alone at the organ,
At the close of a troubled day,
When the sunset's crimson embers
On the western skies lay.
I was weary with vain endeavor,
My heart was ill at ease,
And I sought to soothe my sadness
With the voice of the sweet toned keys.

My hands were weak and trembling,
My fingers all unskilled,
To render the grand old anthem
With which my soul was filled.
Through the long day's cares and worries,
I had dreamed of that glorious strain,
And I longed to hear the organ
Repeat it to me again.

It fell from my untaught fingers
Discordant and incomplete,
I knew not how to express it,
Or to make the discord sweet;
So I toiled with patient labor
Till the last bright gleams were gone,
And the evening's purple shadows
Were gathering one by one.

Then a Master stood beside me,
And touched the noisy keys,
And lo! the discord vanished
And melted in perfect peace.
I heard the great organ pealing
My tone that I could not play,
The strains of the glorious anthem
That had filled my soul all day.

Down through the dim cathedral
The tide of music swept,
And through the shadowy arches
The lingering echoes crept;
And I stood in the purple twilight
And heard my tune again,
Not my feeble, untaught rendering,
But the Master's perfect strain.

So I think, perchance, the Master,
At the close of life's weary day,
Will take from our trembling fingers
The tune that we cannot play;
He will hear through the jarring discord
The strain, although half expressed;
He will blend it in perfect music,
And add to it all the rest.

THE SEVENTH-DAY, No. 0.

[Copyrighted, 1887.]

KEEPING THE SABBATH DAY NOT A SUCCESS.

Since the introduction of the gospel, the blessing of God, for some reason, does not go with the observance of the seventh day. Whenever tried, and that is many times, it has been a failure. An inclination to cling to the forms of the old law and turn back to Judaism in one way or another, has manifested itself in the church now and then from the days of Paul down. Christians of this stamp were the pests of Paul's whole life. Their earnest warning was, "Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved." Acts xv. 1. With the same spirit they now warn us that, "Except ye keep the seventh day, ye cannot be saved." Paul was deeply moved by these errors, for he knew that in the end they led away from Christ. The Galatian church was nearly ruined by these Judaizers, till Paul exclaimed, "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." Gal. i. 8. Paul's curse has seemed to follow all such attempts ever since. It has been so with the numerous attempts to revive the Jewish Sabbath, as history abundantly shows.

Elder J. N. Andrews, seventh day Adventist, has industriously gathered up the notices of those, here and there along, who have kept the seventh day. Of course he has set them out in the most favorable light; yet even then their weakness as Christians and their generally heretical notions in other respects are manifest.

Elder A. says: "The first of these ancient Sabbatarian bodies was the Nazarenes. Of these Moser testifies that they 'retained the Sabbath; and though they pretended to believe as Christians, yet they practised as Jews, and so were in reality neither one nor the other.'" ("Hist. Sabbath," p. 388.) Not a very good recommend for the day to start with. Of their final end Gibbon says: "The Nazarenes retired from the ruins of Jerusalem to the little town of Pella, beyond the Jordan, where that ancient church languished above sixty years in solitude and obscurity." (Decline and Fall," chap. 15). That was the character and end of the first Sabbatarian sect. It is a pretty fair sample of all that have followed since.

During the dark ages we find a body of Sabbatarians who were, as usual, half Jews. They are thus described by Mosheim: They held "that the observance of the law of Moses, in everything except the offering of sacrifices, was obligatory upon Christians; in consequence of which they circumcised their followers, abstained from those meats the use of which was prohibited under the Mosaic economy, and celebrated the Jewish Sabbath." ("Eccl. His.," cent. 12, part 2, chap. 5, sect. 14). Poor kind of Christians those were! They soon disappear entirely. The Abyssinians in Africa kept the seventh day for ages, and observed Sunday also. Elder A. claims that they derived their Sabbath-keeping either from the apostles or at least very early. They still kept it in the fifteenth century. Now, what did it do to them? Did it make them better Christians than Sunday-keepers were? No indeed; on the contrary, they were sunken lower than any other sect bearing the name of Christians. Elder A. confesses that "in many respects they have lost the pure and spiritual religion of our divine Redeemer." ("Hist. Sabbath," p. 424). They hold to circumcision, the worship of the Virgin Mary, and all sorts of fanatical notions. They are described by a modern author as sunken in "spiritual barrenness and ecclesiastical putrefaction." ("Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia," article "Abyssinian church.") In fact their doctrines are a mixture of Jewish, Christian and heathen notions. This is all that Sabbatarianism has done for them. It explodes the idea so strongly urged by Sabbatarians that the keeping of that day will preserve a people from all other errors. Here it has had a fair trial on a whole nation for 1,500 years, and proved an utter failure.

The reformation developed some prominent Sabbatarians. Among the most noted of these was Carlstadt, a talented and highly educated man, the friend and companion of Luther. He kept the seventh day, wrote in favor of it, and urged it strongly. Elder A. devotes one whole chapter to the history of this man. (See pp. 446—469). Nor was Carlstadt alone in his Sabbatarian views. Elder A. says: "When the reformation had lifted the veil of darkness that covered the nations of Europe, Sabbath-keepers were found in Transylvania, Bohemia, Russia, Germany, Holland, France and England." ("Hist. Sabbath," p. 460).

Here, then, the seventh day had a strong foothold and a fair start in the very beginning of the reformation. Now test this Sabbath-keeping by the rules laid down in the Bible, and see how it will come out. "And now I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone; for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God. And to him they agreed." Acts v. 38-40. That was an excellent test, and the apostles were glad to abide by it. In a few years they filled the world with their doctrine and their churches. But at the reformation what became of all the seventh day advocates and their widespread effort for the Jewish Sabbath? Just nothing at all. It all fizzled in the pan. And now, after three hundred and fifty years of trial, scarcely a remnant of them can be found in any country of Europe. They number less now than they did then. It has come to nought because the blessing of God did not follow it. But those who rejected the seventh day and kept Sunday have been mightily prospered till they number 136,000,000. They have revolutionized the world, and done a noble work for the gospel and the salvation of souls. Which has borne the test? Now this is remarkable if Sunday-keeping is indeed "the mark of the beast," "an enormous error," "a most fearful sin," a violation of the law of God. And if keeping the seventh day is such an important thing in the sight of God, why did he not bless those who tried it? Laban said to Jacob, "I have learned my experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake." Gen. xxx. 27. Yes, actual experience is the very best test in the world of anything. Now, if experience, if the history of the church, if the providence of God, proves anything, then keeping Saturday is not a success. No class of people are more ready than seventh day Adventists to point to any little success they may have as proof that God is with them. They have just published a pamphlet of forty-eight pages devoted to proving that the success of a church is evidence that God is with it, and the failure of a church is proof that God is against it. Then they contrast their growth with the feeble efforts of a little party which drew off from them, and conclude that God is with them and not with others. But, according to their own test, what kind of a show do they stand when compared with the success of Sunday-keepers?

Take another rule: Jesus says: "By their fruits ye shall know them." Those who have kept the Jewish Sabbath in the Christian age have generally mixed with it many fanatical and heretical notions. As we have seen above, the Nazarenes were Judaizers, and the Abyssinians were sunken in many superstitions. Carlstadt was one of the most noted fanatics of the reformation. During Luther's absence he came near ruining the reformation entirely. (See Andrews' "History of the Sabbath," pp. 446, 449, and "Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia," article "Carlstadt"). The Sabbath keepers in Transylvania denied the divinity of Christ and took extreme Unitarian grounds. ("Hist. Sabbath," p. 461.) Those in Russia held to circumcision and the ceremonial law. (p. 456.) Other points will be noticed as we proceed.

As we have already seen, the seventh day Baptists began in England in the time of the reformation, over three hundred years ago. They had many able men, ministers and writers. They published many books, discussed the subject widely, and made many converts. Here again they had a fine field and a fair start. How did Sabbath-keepers succeed? What have they accomplished in England? Three hundred years ought to be long enough to tell whether it is a success or not. Let Elder Andrews tell the sad story: "In the seventeenth century eleven churches of Sabbatarians flourished in England, while many scattered Sabbath-keepers were to be found in various parts of the kingdom. Now but three of these churches are in existence! And only remnants, even of these, remain!" ("Hist. Sabbath," p. 491.) Since he wrote the above, two more out of the three, I believe, have expired, and only one little company of less than ten members survives! Elder A. sorrowfully asks, "To what cause shall we assign this painful fact? The cause is evident; God is not in it. It comes to nought every time it is tried. Three hundred years hence, if time should last so long, the same mournful requiem will be chanted over the grave of seventh day Adventism.

Less than one hundred years ago another effort was made in England by the Sabbatarians, or new Israelites, to revive the observance of the Jewish Sabbath. A high authority says of them: They "ordered the strictest observance of the Jewish law and Sabbath." This sect, "who at one time numbered a hundred thousand, continued till 1831 to observe the Jewish Sabbath and the ceremonials of the law." ("Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia," article "Sabbatarians.") This is by far the largest number of professed Christians who have ever kept the seventh day. Now did it come out? Just as it has every time before, and always will: it failed entirely, and now scarcely a remnant of them is left. "Four congregations of believers, comprising 198 persons, were reported in England by the census of 1851." ("Johnson's Cyclopedia," article "Southcott.") The hand of God seems to be against their seventh day keeping every time.

Now, look at the history of Sabbatarian effort in America. They began their work at Newport, R. I., in 1664, over two hundred years ago. December 23, 1671, they organized their first church. (See "Manual of the seventh day Baptists," pp. 39, 40.) What have they accomplished? Almost nothing. They now number only about 8,000, and are hardly holding their own, or, at most, only gaining a few score per year, less than the increase of their children. Largely their youth abandon Saturday for Sunday. With many of the older people keeping the seventh day is merely a nominal affair. They will let their shops and their business run right on while they themselves go to church! For convenience they mostly colonize together, and so have little influence on the world. To their praise be it said that they are an excellent people, and free from any fanatical or other heretical notions. Here again the seventh day has had the fairest possible chance of success. Its advocates are intelligent, highly educated, respected, free from any other heretical or fanatical notions, and live in this free land and age of investigation. Why has it not succeeded? That it has not they themselves must admit. These sober, stubborn facts should have weight with us Sabbatarian brethern, stop and weigh these things fairly. What is the use of wasting life contending for what is a practical failure?

There is a body of German seventh day Baptists in Pennsylvania, who practise trine immersion, foot washing, and teach celibacy. Another body of seventh day Baptists, in Virginia, observe the law of Moses touching meats, and hold other peculiar ideas not according to the gospel. It is observable that the seventh day generally goes with some other heretical or fanatical idea.

If, now, keeping Saturday is so highly pleasing to God, why does he not prosper it more? If Sunday observance is such a sin in the sight of God, why does he so remarkably bless those who persist in it? At least one-half of those who now keep the seventh day were themselves converted in Sunday-keeping churches! How is this? Theory is very nice, but often delusive and impracticable. Experience is the only safe test of any theory. Tried in these balances, the Jewish Sabbath is found wanting every time.

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. Weethee.—

This is a religious book of surpassing sweet lustre. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring "What are the signs of the coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

MICA PEN-NOTES.

I like very much, Romans xv. 13.—"Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost."

There are three, yes, four blessed qualities, or titles, applied to the good and Holy One, by the apostle in this chapter. He is called the God of patience, of consolation, of peace, and of hope. What a precious sum of definitions or designations! God is patient,—patient toward the weak, the unreasonable, the wrong-headed, the wilful, the wicked,—and patient toward the infirmities and short-comings of his people. And as for consolation, he loves to console the bereaved, the poor, the buffeted, the head and hand and foot weary, and the heart-broken. He loves to comfort them, and through their faith in him in particular, a faith springing from the knowledge of his infinite and wonderful goodness. God is so kind and consoling in his nature, that he is called the God of consolation, just as a bee is an example of industry, a dove of innocence, or a lion of courage. And he is the God of peace. Not only does he dwell in peace, the peace of an infinite loving instinct, and harmony of all thought and operation in colossal works, but he loves to bestow, to create, to encourage and accomplish peace,—peace where it shall come as the dew and the dawn, peace like balm, like a mother's lullaby. And he is the God of hope. Not that he hopes anything, when he sees and orders all things without doubt or mistake, and knows as perfectly what he will do, and what he will be, as if it were already done. Hope belongs to beings limited and dependent. And to them, to creatures subject to infirmity, liable to discouragement, disappointment and reverses, he loves to encourage and establish hope. He is the God of hope! Glorious revelation. Over him in gentle majesty rises the rainbow, that has no wrath or terror in its arch. He loves to minister hope to all who will see hope and heaven in him, and take their most delightful incentive to hope, and inspiration of hope, from his word, his mercy and his power.

God teaches through such as Christ, his Son, and Paul his apostle, that he loves to give the grandest of gifts to beget and begin hope, that is, his Holy Spirit. Yes, he gives us this most blessed, special, precious, imperial gift. One will say, "Would to God I had money,"—another;—"Would to God, I had talent, education, prosperity." But Jesus here passes by all the longed for goods and gifts, and says, God will give you his Holy Spirit if you ask him, and that is power, life, light, riches and preciousness. And the Spirit, among the other blessed products of its presence, begets this blessed sentiment and power of hope.

There are some people that have no great gift or habit of hoping any way. They seem comparatively indifferent to life. They have little joy, or anticipation of good, and live indifferently if not indolently. Others live in a state of despondency bordering on despair. They have trials, losses, ill-health, hardship, and great mental darkness and forlornness. It may be they have a constitutional, a hereditary gloominess. Others have plenty of the buoyancy of anticipation. They are hopeful even in adversities. Their hopes may be even audacious and unreasonable. They may hope for unlikely or impossible things, hope for things that would be pernicious even if they were practicable. Others again hope for what is good and right and wise, hope for what is possible, and what is promised, and what is desirable, and hope for it from God, and rejoice in the greatness and wealth of their possession. They hope because they have learned—(O, the glory and happiness of the knowledge) of what inestimable preciousness is the Spirit of God, dwelling in their hearts. They have ceased from sin, that bane of hope, or they trust in God that they will be delivered from its power, and O, the trust is the mother of hope. They hope by the help of the Spirit. They pray earnestly, sometimes instantly, and incessantly,—they pray to God above them and God within them, and trust in his pure, perfect, blessed and unfailing truth and faithfulness. The apostle hopes for those Roman brethren, all fulness of joy,—nothing less—and fulness of hope, by the power of God.

How gracious and admirable is the working of the Spirit, that grandly and soundly produces hope,—hope without deceitfulness, hope not false and illusory! No matter though the working is secret and silent, and it may be largely unfelt. How like the magical and myriad processes in nature! Each atom in the kernel of grain is placed silently but exactly. Each kernel is set in the ear, with most perfect orderliness. The sap steals inaudibly along its channels in the fruitful wood. Only the ear Divine hears its delicate murmur of motion. Thus quiet yet marvelous, are the activities of the Spirit. But in the Christian heart, the work is perpetual. It goes on day and night. How welcome to the spiritual mind is this most exalted potency! If there are those who seem to feel the working of this life in any special measure, and wish to shout aloud, let them do it, I have no objection. Only let it not be a mere animal excitement. Let it not be a misapprehended or stimulative experience.

In view of the exceeding and exalted importance and preciousness of the Spirit, working hope in the heart, with what eagerness should it be coveted! This is a holy covetousness, for which there is no rebuke. With what order of pursuit, with what importunity of prayer, whith what intensely earnest, secret or vocal pleading, may it well be sought for! Think of men with eyes flashing, on the hunt for hidden prey in the jungle;—or the gold hunter with flushed face and rapid strife, marching for the mines. Think of all the hearts that burn for riches and honor on earth. How should not hearts touched with the fire of love and light from God, burn for the gift of the spirit in priceless working power to produce hope, and all godly fruits and graces in the soul and in the life! How little we know of the power and effect of intensity and persistency in seeking. These are the things that tell. Mighty seeking will have mighty winning. Count all else trash in comparison. Have singleness of mind. Be exclusive for once and for always toward God for a grand quest. Be wonderfully limited to God, and most discreetly and carefully beware of limiting him. Think nothing too great or large to ask, within the wide and vast area of the Divine will, and word of promise. Believe possibilities boundless, when motive is pure, and the understanding is ruled by God's word of truth and mind and wisdom. No height of attainment of other times, or of other saints, need seem impossible now. For we are not to compare and measure ourselves altogether with others, but seek to have whatsoever it seemeth good for an Infinite God to give. We are to rise to the height of his holy calling in the election of grace and love. Soul! Brother! Since thy Father is the God of hope, to what power and abundance in hope, doth he call thee? Is there not mighty power in hope? Doth it not almost raise the dead to life? Doth it not kindle a beam of light in the eye lustreless, by suffering; and the wear and tear and drag of disappointment? What magic in words and looks that enkindle hope in hearts weary and faint! How a physician's hearty voice and manner rouses the invalid from his stupefaction, and flushes his wan face with an auspicious and almost luminous ray of hope! There are people who truly need rebuking, and who should accept it even gratefully; who may well say, "that is right, I deserve to be reprimanded. I take it heartily, and endorse the judgment. Nay, I reprove and condemn myself." But I presume a greater number need the rousing and cheerful influence of encouragement. They need electrifying with some word or power that will enkindle new hope. Hope, as a motive, is something positive and elastic and transforming. It has in it magic and health and power. A sound hope, a good hope, a hope without self-deception—without the deceitfulness of sin,—a hope built on truth and promise, a hope growing out of concord with God, and growing along with the love of righteousness, —this is it,—this is the treasure, this is the gold without alloy, this is the nidus of the spiritual electricity, or if you please the evolution of it. It is in itself electric. People of God,—then begin life anew,—have at least a new impulse and invigoration. Things in nature grow slowly for awhile, and then suddenly manifest a new vigor, and progress with redoubled speed. So may you. Have this power of hope in you mightily. Or if you do not feel it spring up within you, as you desire and pray, then cultivate it faithfully and busily. Believe in God, and believe God dwelling in you. Trust in the very Spirit of the living God. Seek without ceasing. Cry without wearying. Call without ever forbearing. With the foolish ones prayer is unfashionable. In the esteem of the silly ones, it is unprofitable and useless. In the sound sense, in the consciousness and confidence of the people of faith, prayer is just as in Elijah's time—just as in the apostles' days—just as in the times of Luther and Knox and Wesley, a key of God. God respects it, and he respects courage, persistence and determination. And he loves to reward the grand indomitableness that takes no denial, but presses on and wins. Aye, beloved, we must cultivate hope. We have no business with despair. Does God love despair? Does he delight in it, or encourage it? And yet some almost fancy a half-despair something necessary, something almost virtuous, something which if pitiful, may have its benefit. But what lesson or benefit can it have, except to reveal its own unlovelieness, that hope may glow and shine and be glorious by contrast? Did you ever know a child morbidly and curiously desiring to be sick, with a vague and vain idea of some enjoyment or profit in it? But no more foolish is such a fancy than the vain idea of any virtue in sighing and despondency. Despondency is the gate of misery, and those who flounder in the barren sand-drifts, or in the miry abysses of a hopeless melancholy, may be rather bluntly said to have all the hell they live for. But we call the desponding and floundering, to hope. We would have the bugle call of God in the gospel, heard with a thrill, and answered with a spring, and honored with a new life and a new walk. We are called to walk before God. It is to us, as well as it was to Abraham. Do you not hear the call? Do you not feel it? What saith God by David in one Psalm? "The eye of the Lord is on them that fear him, on them that hope in his mercy." Further on, trumpet-tongued, is this again, "the Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear him, in them that hope in his mercy." Here is a holy fear first and a sweet, serene, cheerful, intelligent hoping in God, that is actually praised, and in which God is pleased. What a call to hope! Hear again the psalmist remonstrating with himself, and saying to his soul, as if it were another entirely. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Hope thou in God." And he very properly associate his God to be health; for the countenance is an index of health or disease. And what is healthier and more health-promoting than hope? O, hoping in God! How magical, how natural, how noble and right! And if we are awkward or ignorant in the way, or walk, or act, of hoping in God, then it is time that we learned. We must learn by coming to God, learn by thinking how healthy and strong and good he is; that he is the soul of truth and kindness and good will, that in his every thing kind and wholesome and attractive in his nature, and that he has and is the best for us in the universe.

C. COLEBROOK.

Soul Distinct from Body.

A gentleman, who was eminent as a scientist, some years since died in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., from a wasting and protracted disease. He was also a devout Christian. On one occasion, as he lay on his bed, he stretched forth his pallid and emaciated hand, and, as nearly as we can recall his words, spoke as follows:

"You see this hand. Let me tell you that it is not myself. It is my hand and not yours. I do not call it myself, or think of it as such. I might lose it, and yet be myself. And what is true of this hand is also true of every other part of my body. This whole body with all its organs is not myself. My doctor tells me that I must die before long. He is mistaken. I am not going to die at all. It is only my body that will die. That body is not and never was myself. I live in this body now, but shall soon quit it, and then I shall live elsewhere. My friends will bury this body, but they will not bury me. I shall not be there to be buried with it. I expect then to be in heaven, where Christ is; and I expect to be perfectly holy and happy there. This cancerous tumor which is about to destroy my body will destroy nothing else. My essential self will still remain."

Such, for substance, is what this gentleman said at the last interview the writer ever had with him. It was said in a quiet, peaceful and scholarly manner, with a slow and thoughtful utterance. The dominant thought running all through this utterance is one that we ought to emphasize in our meditations, as we go through life, and when we come to the final hour. It is a Biblical thought. That materialism which traces mental life to the body, and makes the latter essential to the former, has no warrant in the Bible, or in sound reason. The body is simply the "earthly house of the tabernacle"—the present abode and the present instrument of the mental man resident therein, but essentially no part of that man, and not indispensable to his existence or to the activity of his powers. He can exist and act out of it as really as he ever did in it. So Paul thought when he said: "For we know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Beautiful thought with which to live, and a beautiful thought with which to quit this world!

Dear Restitution:

Is it not strange that in matters pertaining to human nature and human destiny, eminent scientists should be quoted in preference to the unerring word of inspiration. The writer of the above article seems to make as much ado over the death-bed delirious utterances of some man who died in Brooklyn recently, as our French and English subterranean explorers make over some long-concealed ruins, corroborative of sacred history.

"You see this hand. Let me tell you that it is not myself. It is my hand and not yours, etc." He says this is true of every other part of his body! I wonder how it would be if instead of the hand it was his head taken off? This talk reminds me of a story I heard at Bay Ridge the other day. An Irishman was proving that the body and not the head was the seat of intelligence. To prove his position he told the following chicken story: "The rooster," said he, "had found something which he wanted to share with his female companions. The farmer was on the spot and being annoyed at the way the chickens were scratching up his seeds, the first hen that started toward the rooster he cut her head from her body with an old grass hook he had in his hand, the hen though made her home run without her head!" Most of us doubted the story and it made him very angry. My Methodist friends are also very angry when I tell them that my head, body and limbs are myself. The vitalizing part, spirit or breath I must surrender some day. When we surrender a thing it ceases to be sure.

The writer of the above surely believes we have to surrender something in death. I wonder what he calls it; O yes, I know now, it is this "mortal coil," "prison house," or "tenement of clay." "He can," he says, "exist out of it and act as really as he ever did in it." "Beautiful thought with which to live, and a beautiful thought with which to die." Yes, very beautiful, but truth in such solemn matters is better than beauty. Will anyone doubt this? "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

I believe if I keep and practice the faith, I will get this house not made with hands when the time comes in the divine order to bestow it. The Scriptures plainly teach that time to be at resurrection and not, as the writer intimates, at death. Isaiah, many hundred years before the birth of our Lord wrote, "Unto us a child is born," not will be born; and speaking of his death, he spoke of it in the present tense also. Paul writing of our house not made with hands and kindred topics, speaks of things to come as though they were already here. Strange that men possessed of common sense in other things, should be so dull in learning the peculiarities of the Scripture style of stating things past, present and future.

"It was said in a scholarly manner." Yes, yes! Scholarship now it would seem takes precedence over truth. What has scholarship to do with God's unchanging law relative to human destiny? "The world by wisdom knows not God."

ISAAC MCCURRY.

Notes by the Way.

I left home August 18th, arrived at Lanark, Ill., at 4 o'clock the same day and was received into the kind hospitality of Brother and Sister Olsown for the night. Spent next day visiting brethren in Lanark. Saturday, the 20th, went in company with Brother Renner's son, to East Plum River, and was received into the kind hospitality of Brother and Sister Renner. Preached Saturday night and Sunday at 11 o'clock; had a basket dinner, then preached again at 2 o'clock, then went to the Union Church, preached again to a small congregation at night, but it looked so much like rain that but few turned out.

Passing over the incidents that occurred from then till Wednesday: at 5 o'clock we started for Gladbrook, Iowa, reached there at 8 o'clock Thursday and was received into the kind hospitality of Brother and Sister Berry, where we remained until the meeting commenced on Friday evening. The meetings were continued over Sunday, and the interest growing deeper, we concluded to continue them each evening until Wednesday. On Wednesday we repaired to the water where we baptized four willing souls into the all-saving name of Jesus the anointed. On Wednesday evening closed our meeting at Gladbrook, the brethren being much refreshed and encouraged. We took the parting hand and started Thursday morning, Sept. 1st, for Odebolt, Sac Co., Ia., where we arrived about 4 o'clock and were met at the depot by Brother J. W. Appleyard. Having got in company on the train with Brother Eychaner, we were conveyed by Brother Appleyard to the place of meeting, a distance of three miles. Here we met for the first time, Brother Boyes, of Geneva, Ill., Brother and Sister Appleyard, of Wall Lake, Iowa, who had preceded us to the place of meeting.

Preparations having been made to hold the meeting in the grove in Brother Appleyard's enclosure, we found it around his house well seated. At 8 o'clock we met in the grove and listened to a discourse on the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the anointed. Friday morning we found it raining, and it being so wet at meeting time that we could not occupy the grove, we repaired to the school house close by at which time the writer discoursed to those assembled from Paul's charge to Timothy, 2 Tim. i. 4. It still being wet, we met at the school house again in the evening to hear a discourse from Brother Eychaner upon the kingdom. This brought us to Saturday, and as it still continued to rain, we had to go to the school house again. Brother Eychaner preached this time upon the new birth. I preached in the evening. Sunday morning it cleared up and by meeting time was dry enough so that we again assembled in the grove. At 10:30 o'clock Brother Eychaner preached, after which we had dinner in the grove. At 2 o'clock I preached again, at which time meeting was appointed for the evening, but before that time it began raining again so that no one came. The brethren remained after the afternoon meeting, and having retired to Brother Appleyard's house, we commemorated the death of our blessed Lord. The rain coming up the majority remained all night. An inquiry or investigation meeting was held till about 11 o'clock. It was thought about the best meeting we had. This ended our meeting at Odebolt.

Monday morning Brother Appleyard started with myself, Brother Eychaner, and another man, in his buggy, for Wall Lake, where we were to take the train. On our way we stopped on the bank of the Boyer River and I baptized the man that was in company with us into the all-saving name of Jesus the anointed. When we reached Wall Lake we found that the terrible rain of the night before had broke the road so that there was not any train either way till afternoon. So we stopped at Brother Thomas Appleyard's till our train arrived at about 3:30 o'clock. When the train came that was to take Brother Eychaner, he got aboard and I was left to wait for my train which did not arrive till about 7 o'clock, when we left Wall Lake for Sac City where we arrived about 8 o'clock p. m. and were received by Brother and Sister Robbins for the night. Next day we visited with Brother and Sister Brown, of Sac City, whom we found firm in the faith and waiting for the kingdom of God. Here I will stop for the present.

Yours Truly,
T. J. WHITNEY.

Dear Editor:

I read: "When poor health distracts head and heart, articles on loving, experimental topics are by far the most soothing to depressed spirits." The paper drops from my hand and my heart goes out to you in sympathy, and here I am writing to you. What shall I say. Thoughts are so mute sometimes that one can only feel, not speak. How many times we are tired,

"Tired, and earth so full of resting places,
Wearied with the dreary march of life."

We feel weak in body and in spirit, so closely has God woven the bond of sympathy between the different elements of our nature. We long for sympathy and a lifting hand, and when they come it is as though they had taken us by the hand and led us under the trees to breathe the sweet perfume of flowers, and rest.

"We are so tired, my heart and I."

We are so weary of earth's pilgrimage, we are hungry and faint and footsore, sick with pain of body and heart. Would that thou wouldst come, our Savior and take our hands in thine and lead us, thy little children, whithersoever thou wouldst have us go. We are thine, we wait for thee, we are lonely without thee. Thou art our Shepherd, we know thy voice and cry out to thee

"Like children crying in the night,
With no language but a cry."

Many times my sympathy has gone out to you as I have read words of yours. I have thought, too, how many other tired hearts and hands there were in the world who needed encouragement and soothing words. You have worded my thought when you say, "Would that we could have less of criticism and speculation, and more of the deeply practical."

Time goes on apace, and it seems as though the waiting ones were being tried and weighed and tested. Worldly things attract the Christian at every point, and allure him away from the coming of Christ. We ought therefore to be trimming our lamps that they may shed abroad a brighter light, and attract the gaze of the worldly-wise. Arguments, learned and long, will never make a Christian. Loving words and deeds, forgiveness of evil, patience in trial these are better arguments for the kingdom. This brought us to thoughts for the Christian's use in our [illegible]

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCTOBER 5, 1887. NO. 37.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and six Months Thereafter.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the annihilation of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for the salvation.

vertigo sinners to Christ than all the wordy logic of the world. Christians are the result of a willing heart, not of the knowledge of the head. Head Christians are those who are answered by, "I know you not," while the willing heart hears the welcome call, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you."

Let us all then by our loving words and thoughtful deeds win souls to him who loves and forgives us all. He was all love and gentleness and patience, and he is our pattern in all things. He bade the weary come to him for rest, and we as his disciples, his servants, sent out to do his bidding, must comfort his weary children as we journey along side by side on the road of life.

I thank you for the many comforting words and beautiful thoughts I have read in your paper, and if it be God's will, may you be spared to minister to us for many years to come. I would be greatly pleased to know you personally, but God has cast our lot so far apart that it may be that only in the other life we shall meet "face to face." Now we are only known by the responsive chords which awaken in our hearts through written words. With kindly regard I am your fellow-worker and friend.

EMILY C. RAMSEN.

Love Eradicates Anger.

You know men who are all but perfect; and who would be almost entirely perfect, but you say they are hasty—they are touchy—they are ill-tempered. Now, there is nothing that a Christian has to take more trouble to eradicate forever from his being than ill-temper. It requires the struggle of years—perhaps of a life-time; but it has to be done. It has to be done. It is not to be looked upon as an accident of temperament; but it is a sin—one of the blackest of all the sins. It is the symptom of an unloving nature at bottom. A want of patience, a want of kindness, a want of generosity, a want of humility, a want of courtesy, a want of unselfishness, are all symbolized in one flash of evil temper. It is the revelation of what is inside a man, and therefore the man who has that must have his whole nature sweetened. It is not enough to deal with the temper. You must go to the root, and sweeten the whole nature, and then temper will die away of itself. But how can a man who has not had a victory over that part of his nature, have a part in God's people in this world or in the next world? How is it possible? Why, a man with a temper such as I have described would make heaven miserable for all the people who are in it; and except such a man be born again he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. Christ says: "If you offend one of these little ones, it were better for you that a mill-stone were hanging about your neck and that you were cast into the depths of the sea." That is to say, it is the deliberate verdict of the Lord Jesus that it is better not to live than not to love. It is better not to live than not to love.

"He will swallow up death in victory." Isa. xxv. 8.

We must not amend that expression —"swallow up." There is a sound in it which is equal to an annotation. We hear a splash in the infinite Atlantic, and the thing that is sunk has gone for ever. It was but a stone. Death is to be not mitigated, relieved, thrown into perspective which the mind can gaze upon without agony; it is swallowed up. Let it go! Death has no friends. Who names the ghastly monster with healthy pleasure? Who brings death willingly to the feast? Asks him to join the dance? Begs him to tarry through the night, and weave stars of glory in the robe of bloom? He is to be swallowed up, slain, forgotten. Yet in another aspect how gracious has death been in human history! What pain he has relieved; what injuries he has thrust into the silent tomb; what tumult and controversy he has ended. Men have found an altar at the tomb, a house of reconciliation in the graveyard, music for the heart in the toll and throb of the last knell. Even death must have his tribute. He may not work willingly. He never saw himself. Let us be [illegible]

A PORTION of our issue of Sept. 21, principally New York and New England States, was destroyed in a railroad accident. If you missed your paper say so on a card, and we will supply you.

HAVING been absent from home about five days, we have no time left to write much editorially. Will give an account of our journey, and of the excellent meeting at Watson, Mich., next week.

THE copy for article No. 7, on the Sabbath, did not come to hand soon enough for insertion in this number of THE RESTITUTION, but as we now have just received it, we shall give it a place in our next. These articles are able and timely and should be attentively read by all lovers of the gospel. Some of the unhappy results of turning away from grace to legalism are faithfully depicted in the number for next week.

HON. William Windom, ex-Secretary of the Treasury, delivered an address last July on "The Saloon in Politics," which was printed in the New York Independent. We reprint somewhat lengthy extracts from that address, as it shows that the whole business of Saloon keeping is not only calculated to make criminals, but that the trade itself ought to be branded as a criminal calling. It is impossible to express the meanness, vileness, and loathsome wickedness of the whole work of drunkard-making—although legalized—in language too expressive. The Hon. ex-Senator and ex-Secretary has done well; and would that all in high places would disclaim all sympathy with the abominable traffic as pointedly and faithfully as Hon. William Windom has done.

WHILE we sympathize with individuals in their troubles, with local churches in their trials, and with conferences in conflicting views; and while all these matters have been spread out before the Editor, with the object of having them further displayed before the readers of THE RESTITUTION, we must say, for ourself, that we most earnestly desire to be excused from all personal participation in any of these matters; and, also, that we deem all such themes of discord entirely unsuited to our columns. It is by far best for individuals, churches, and conferences, to settle all their difficulties, misunderstandings and discords among themselves in the fear of God, and of the retributions of the great day, as the wider all such things are proclaimed it is only so much the worse for the parties concerned. As Editor of THE RESTITUTION we propose to take a neutral stand, and if this policy does not suit, our brethren can displace us next month. When we go abroad to preach we meddle with none of these matters. So never refer them to us.

Dear Restitution:

I was glad to see in THE RESTITUTION of Aug. 10th, Brother Waothee's review of the Niagara Conference, and particularly his deductions from their standpoint constituting them only third rate in the Advent platform. I had the privilege of assembling with them last year and was forcibly impressed with their non-allusion to the object for which Christ predicts his coming again, and at its close I wrote to one of its agents in effect that while listening to the varied able speeches delivered at the Conference so erudite in diction on the subject of the second advent, I was forcibly struck with the absence of allusions to the object of Christ's return, so expressive in inference and detail in the proclamation of the gospel, denominated in synonymous terms glad tidings of the "Kingdom of God" and "of Heaven," the latter term so generally adopted by Matthew, and through its more Hebraistic cast, had become the common expression of the Jew in our Lord's time for denoting the state of things expected to be brought in by the Messiah. These expectations were the result of their acquaintance with the prophets, the whole of whom detailed his glorious kingdom, the use of the expression by Matthew and uttered by our Savior himself without a note of explanation, as it all perfectly understood what was meant by it, seems alone conclusive evidence of this, and is therefore the more impressive in its proclamation and commission.

The Old Testament constitution and the writings belonging to it, had familiarized the Jews to the employment of the terms, King and Kingdom, to God, not merely with reference to his universal sovereignty, but also to his special connection with the people he had chosen for himself, and while the polity set up among the covenant people did not formally differ from that of the other States and peoples around them, yet, there was a grand peculiarity in Israel's case, viz., that an invisible head was chosen to hold the place of king—the Lord of heaven and earth—the sequel and overturning is matter of history, the restoration of which necessitates the return of him to whom it belongs, "whose right it is," and this constitutes our hope and the nucleus of the advent cause, but it, as orthodoxically maintained, the kingdom was not thus known. If it is correct to assert that the Jews and the disciples utterly misapprehended its meaning through its spiritual significance, if the announcement denoted one thing to its hearers and something entirely different in its development, how comes it that Christ did send out his disciples to preach the kingdom without previous instruction as to its real meaning? The conclusion is obvious. Their acquaintance and familiarity with the kingdom through its plain portrayal in Old Testament phraseology, needed no spiritual interpretation to its overthrow.

Prominent to view as held by Jews is the personal coming of the Messiah, the literal restoration of the Davidic throne and kingdom, the personal reign of Messiah on David's throne, the resultant exaltation of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation, and the fulfilment of the millennial description of that reign. And this being all future constitutes the hope and anticipation of those in the Christ, the components of the Advent Church, that polity of believers having not only their lamps burning, but in this having their supply of oil for renewal in their lamps at the voice of their bridegroom coming. Notwithstanding the shortsightedness in this respect, I conclude the Advent Conference a step in advance in this our day, and the prominence now given to it, helpful in the removal of the cobwebs of superstition and darkness, and I trust it will soon emerge from the fetters of educational bias and give forth the resplendent light of the truth; then what a phalanx of power would be contained in the agregate of such master minds as were there assembled for the dissemination of the truth, if with single eye they saw and conspired to promulgate it in uncertain sound. The above will somewhat illustrate the advisability and necessity for a National Conference of those more advanced in the cause, such as I have noticed is advocated in THE RESTITUTION. Yours respectfully in Israel's hope.

JOHN T. SHAFFER.

Selections.

HOW READEST THOU?

The ancients had a saying concerning the Scriptures that is useful here. They said, "Distinguish the periods, and the Scriptures will harmonize." "Distinguish the periods;" and here comes the very point—the period. The Jew had fastened his attentions so on one portion of the prophecies that he saw but one period—the glorious period of the Messiah's reign; and the Christian church had for centuries so fixed its attention on one part of the prophecies only that it saw but one period,—the coming of Messiah to be crucified. Jewish prejudices arose from the partial attention to the prophecies, and Christian prejudice has arisen from partial attention to the prophecies. It should be our privilege to distinguish the periods; and while we maintain, as Christians, the literal fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy of the Virgin's Child, and the birth at Bethlehem as foretold by Micah, and therefore that the Messiah has come, we ought to maintain, also, with the Jews, the literal interpretation of Isaiah's prophecy, that the Messiah shall reign at Jerusalem and the prophecy of Micah, that Jerusalem shall be chief of the nations, and therein to believe with the Jews that the Messiah shall come. He has come, and he shall come. Surely this was the real nature and genius of what the angels said to the disciples, as you may read in the first chapter of the Acts of Apostles. The disciples, in astonishment, saw their Divine Master carried up into the air from them, and disappearing in the clouds; and, while they were looking up in amazement, two angels appeared, and said, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven?" What was the cause? Have you ever asked yourselves what was the cause of the amazing astonishment of the disciples? Not the mere physical miracle: they were too much accustomed to the physical miracles of their Master to be surprised at that merely, and to make us suppose that to have been the cause of their astonishment. How does what the angels said afterwards address itself to that? "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus whom you have seen go, shall so come." Was that calculated to abate their astonishment at the miracle which had taken place? Nay, but it was to assert another miracle. How, then, shall we interpret the incident? What was the basis and ground of their astonishment? I think it very plain and instructive. They had learned unmistakably that Jesus was the Messiah; they were present when they heard Peter's confession, and the remarkable approbation which was expressed of it by the Lord Jesus: they knew then that he was the Messiah, the one that was to come, and they expected great things for their nation; they knew that a number of the prophecies, still unfulfilled, were connected with the Messiah's name: they were looking for them; and when he was taken from them and put to death, their expectations were dashed to the ground. When, however, they saw him again after the resurrection, their expectations revived, and they said, "Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?"—will you finish it all now? And when he had given them an answer, not, indeed, to reject their idea that the kingdom would be restored, but only to tell them the time was not for them to know,—when he had done this, he was suddenly taken up from among them, and they were left in amazement. What were they ready to say within their own minds and hearts? "After all, is he not the Messiah?" Is it possible that we are wrong? And if he be, how can he have gone away, leaving so much undone that was predicted of the Messiah? He has done enough to assure us that he is the Messiah. He has fulfilled some prophecies: at his word the deaf man heard; at his word the tongue of the dumb man sang; at his word the lame leaped for joy; at his word the dead have come to life. He must be the Messiah; and yet he is gone! no kingdom restored to Israel! no reigning at Jerusalem!" There was ground for astonishment; and in that state of astonishment the angels addressed them—"Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven?" as if he had left undone what had been promised. Do not imagine that all is to be done at one time. "Distinguish the periods." He is gone, it is true, but he is not gone forever. That same Jesus whom you have seen go "shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Then is the time of the fulfilment of the prophecies. I do not know whether I told you of a conversation I overheard some years ago, between a clergyman of the Church of England and a Jew, in the vestry of a church in London. I had been preaching on Jewish prophecies, and giving to the congregation, as plainly as I could, what I have now been endeavoring to convey to your minds; and to the vestry, after the service, two Jews came, to express their gratification for what they had heard and their willingness to hear from me more about Jesus of Nazareth, and to invite me to go the next morning to breakfast with them. They were willing to hear me more. Well, I referred them to the clergyman who came in at the same moment; and he was a man of some mark in our church, too. He had come into the vestry room, holding the back of his hand towards me, and said, "How can you preach such nonsense?" "Well, now," I said, "if you will allow me, while changing my dress, I will refer you to these Jewish gentlemen to converse;" and they very soon got into the thick of the argument. The Jew said to him, "Oh, upon that sort of interpretation, sir, I deny that a virgin ever had a son." "Oh, but," said the clergyman, "we know that it is true." "How do you know it?" "It is said in the Bible." "Well," said the Jew, "what more is said in the Bible?" "He shall reign upon the throne of his father David: —is not that in the Bible?" "Yes." "Well is not that what the gentleman has been telling us? and you didn't believe it. You call it nonsense. Now, if you deny that, I deny the other." "Well," said the clergyman, "but we know that the prophecy of the birth of Christ of a virgin is true, because it is a matter of fact." Sir, I shall never forget the Jew's face,—he looked at him with such a withering sneer. "Ay," said he, "you believe because it is done; we believe because God has said."—Prophetic Times.

The End of Evil.

When we are told that Christ is to "reign till he shall have put all things under his feet," and that "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death," this does afford some ground for expecting the ultimate extinction of evil and suffering, by the total destruction of such as are incapable of good and of happiness. If "eternal death" means final death—without any revival we can understand what is meant by "death being the last enemy destroyed," viz.: that none henceforth are to be subjected to it. But if "death" be understood to mean everlasting life in misery, then it would appear that death is never to be destroyed at all; since, although no one should be henceforth sentenced to it, it would still be going on as a continued infliction for ever.

On the whole, therefore, I think we are not warranted in concluding (as some have done), so positively concerning this question, as to make it a point of Christian faith to interpret figuratively, and not literally, the "death" and the "destruction" spoken of in Scripture as the doom of the condemned; and to insist on the belief that they are to be kept alive forever.

"Life," as applied to their condition (the condition of the righteous) is usually understood to mean "happy life." And that their's will be a happy life, we are indeed plainly taught; but I do not think we are anywhere taught that the word "life" does of itself necessarily imply happiness. If so, indeed, it would be a mere tautology to speak of a "happy life;" and a contradiction to speak of a "miserable life;" which we know is not the case, according to the usage of any language. In all ages and countries, "life," and the words answering to it in their languages, have always been applied, in ordinary discourse, to a wretched life, no less properly than to a happy one.

Life, therefore, in the received sense of the word, would apply equally to the condition of the blest and the condemned, supposing these last to be destined to continue forever living in a state of misery. And yet, to their condition the words "life" and "immortality" never are applied in Scripture. If, therefore, we suppose the hearers of Jesus and his Apostles to have understood, as nearly as possible, in the ordinary sense, the words employed, they must naturally have conceived them to mean (if they were taught nothing to the contrary) that the condemned were really and literally to be "destroyed," and cease to exist; not that they were to exist forever in a state of wretchedness. For they are never spoken of as being kept alive, but as forfeiting life; as for instance: "Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life;"—"He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." And again, "perdition," "death," "destruction," are employed in numerous passages to express the doom of the condemned. All which expressions would, as I have said, be naturally taken in their usual and obvious sense, if nothing were taught to the contrary.—Archbishop Whately.

Christ the Centre.

As the sun is the centre of our solar system, so Christ is the Christian's sun and centre of desire. As gravitation holds the planets in their proper orbits so love holds the resting heart in the pathway of willing obedience. As in completing the solar circuit, the earth receives the pleasing variety of seasons adapted to beauty and health, and to promote all organic life, so in our loving service of Christ, there is a pleasing and useful variety of gracious and profitable experiences. Sometimes fierce storms sweep across our pathway to drive us into the shelter of his promised grace. Sometimes the cold repulsiveness of the world's unbelief and sin chills us like a winter's blast, driving us to the central, steady sunlight of a Savior's constant love, causing springtime to burst forth in the Christian's heart, and bursting buds of developing faith and love to expand into the fruits of Christian grace. But there is no winter in the sun. And he who has the Sun of Righteousness in his heart will have constantly the springtime of his abiding love.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

For, lo! the days are hastening on
By prophet bards foretold,
When—with the ever-circling years
Comes round the age of gold:
When peace shall over all the earth
Its ancient splendors fling,
And the whole world give back the song
Which now the angels sing.
—Edmund Hamilton Sears.

We may know the love of Christ, and be filled with it, and constrained by it, even as we know by experience the cool refreshment of a fountain whose depths we cannot fathom, and rejoice in the warm beams of the sun whose greatness we cannot comprehend. They who best know that love, understand best what the apostle means when he says that it "passeth knowledge."—Dr. Van Dyke.

Do Christ this one favor, for all his love to thee: love all his saints; even the poorest, the meanest, and the weakest, notwithstanding some slight differences in judgment. As the names of the children of Israel were graven on Aaron's breast plate, so are the names of all God's saints engraven on the heart of Christ. Let them be likewise so on thine.—Wilcox.

Little boats always totter about on the surface of the water, going all ways, as it happens, and overturning in a breath, while the great ship sinks deeply and more deeply in and goes steadily on. The cause of its steadiness is its depth. So abiding in the great truths of God gives steadfastness of motion to the soul. Under all the pressure of error and unbelief, and false doctrines it is unmovable, abounding in the work of the Lord.

THE ANCESTRAL LINE.

There is a relation between the smallest insect that hums in the summer air and the archangel on his throne. God can trace a direct ancestral line from the blue-jay that last spring built its nest in a tree behind the house, to some one of that flock of birds which, when Noah hoisted the ark's window, with a whirl and dash of bright wings went out to sing over Mount Ararat. The tulips that bloomed this summer in the flowerbed were nursed off last winter's snowflakes. The farthest star on one side of the universe could not look to the furthest star on the other side and say, "You are no relation to me;" for, from that bright orb a voice of light would ring across the heavens, responding, "Yes, yes; we are sisters."

God's plans are magnificent beyond all comprehension. He molds us, turns and directs us, and we know it not. Thousands of years are to him but as the flight of a shuttle. The most terrific occurrence does not make God tremble, and the most triumphant achievement does not lift him into rapture. The one great thought of God goes on through the centuries, and nations rise and fall, and eras pass, and the world itself changes, but God still keeps the undivided mastery, linking event to event and century to century. To God they are all one event, one history, one plan, one development, one system. Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty.—Talmage.

Miscellaneous.

The first verse of Gray's "Elegy in a Country Church Yard," reads:

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day.
The lowing herd winds slowly o'er the lea,
The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness, and to me.

The origin of the word "curfew" is thus explained:

The word "curfew" is from the French couvrefeu, cover-fire, and was revived, or introduced in England by William the Conqueror, 1068. On the ringing of the curfew bell at eight o'clock in the evening, all candles and fires were to be extinguished, under a severe penalty. The curfew was abolished by Henry I., in 1100. A so-called curfew bell was rung at West Ham so lately as November, 1859.

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S FATHER.

George Washington was the son of Augustine Washington, a planter, by his second wife, Mary Ball; Augustine was a descendant of John Washington, who emigrated to Virginia from England about 1657, and was a grandson of John Washington, mayor of Northampton, and first lay-proprietor of the Manor of Sulgrave, in Northamptonshire, who married a daughter of Shirly, Earl Ferrars. John and his brother Lawrence, being royalists in the time of Cromwell, both emigrated and became landed proprietors and planters in Virginia, in the district between the Potomac and the Rappahannock Rivers. Augustine Washington died when his second son George, the future President, was twelve years old, and to him bequeathed the lands and mansion which were the family homestead at the time of his decease. The other children were all handsomely provided for by his will, and to the widow was left a life interest in the property of those by his second marriage.

MONEY.

Of very ancient origin is money. It is mentioned as a medium of commerce in the Bible, in Genesis xxiii., where Abraham purchased a field as a sepulchre for Sarah, in the year of the world 2139. Homer speaks of brass money as existing 1184 B. C. The invention of coin is ascribed to the Lydians. Their money consisted of gold and silver. Iron money was used in Sparta, and iron and tin in Great Britain. Julius Cæsar was the first person who obtained the express permission of the Senate to place his image on the Roman coins. Earlier they had placed the image of their deities on the coins. The Romans called their silver moneta, because it was coined in the temple of Juno Moneta, 269 B. C. Money has been made of different materials, even of leather. It was made of pasteboard by the Hollanders as late as 1574. The North American Indians in early times used shells strung together, which they called wampum. Coins were made in many different shapes. English coins were partly square, oblong and round, until the Middle Ages, since when round coins only have been used. The Chinese and Japanese coins are square, with a square hole through the center. The names of many obsolete pieces are met with in Shakespeare and some other English authors, such as the angel, angelot, noble, groat, guinea, etc. The first coin struck in England was the ancient silver penny. It was struck with a cross so deeply indented that it might be easily parted into two for half pence and four for farthings.

All have Their Trials.

Whatever a man builds, the storm will find him. Temptation, bereavement, disappointment, will come upon saint and sinner alike. It's of no use trying to dodge trouble by dodging duty. The man who lives for pleasure, and who has no thought of any enjoyment beyond the present life, has got to have a hard time of it sooner or later. He must know sickness, he must know sorrow, he must meet death, he must give account of every deed done in the body, and of every word spoken, and every thought indulged, also. There is no escaping this. Nor can a child of God expect his Father to preserve him from the times of testing. He who spared not his own Son from the temptations of the wilderness, from the struggle of Gethsemane, from the betrayal by a chosen disciple, from the agonies of Calvary, will not consent that any follower of that Son shall reign with that Son in glory without having been a partaker of the sufferings. Whenever a man's spiritual house is builded the thunders will burst above it, the rains will descend upon it, and the floods will surge about it. The only question is, How can a house be built so as to weather the storm? There is no such thing as being out of the tempest's track. The region of bad weather is traversed by both the broad and the narrow way.

Understanding All Knowledge.

A man may know all about the rocks, and his heart remain as bare as adamant; he may know all about the winds, their courses and their currents, and be the sport of passion as turbulent and fierce as they; he may know all about the stars, and his fate be the meteor, that blazes for a little while, and then is lost, quenched in eternal night; he may know all about the sea, and be a stranger to the peace of God: his soul may resemble its troubled waters, which, lashed by storms and ruffled by every breath of wind, cannot rest, but throws up mire and dirt; he may know how to rule the spirit of the elements, and not know how to rule his own; he may know how to turn aside the thunderbolt, but not the wrath of an angry God. You may know all, in short, that man's genius has discovered or his skill invented, but if you do not know Jesus Christ, if your eyes have never been opened to a saving knowledge of the truth, what will that avail you when they are fixed in their sockets, glazed by the hand of death? Equally by the death-bed of the greatest philosopher, as of the hardest miser that ever ground the faces of the poor, there is room and reason for the solemn question, What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world—all its learning, its wealth, its pleasures and honors—and lose his own soul?

The Glory Filled Earth.

You will find, as early as in Numbers xiv. 21, this word of promise: "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of Jehovah," —not merely shall we see it outside the earth, through an open heaven, on the throne of God, but the earth itself filled with the glory of God! We know it has not as yet been filled. It has been going on from bad to worse; but all the earth is to be filled with this same glory. We work for that glory; and if we work in any other way, or for any other motive, we are not in the mind of God. We are looking for the whole earth to be filled with the glory of Jehovah; but that time "cannot come till the glory come" back; and there is no glory but in the face of Jesus Christ; and until the face of Jesus Christ is seen, the glory of Jehovah cannot fill this earth.—Dr. W. P. Mackay.

One lukewarm Christian may do untold harm to a whole church. Pour a quantity of tepid water into a vessel that contains boiling water, and immediately the temperature of the whole will sink. Just so the contact of men who are indifferent with those who are fervid deadens their fervor, and tends to reduce them to the same lukewarmness.

HE RESTORETH MY SOUL.

I am often so weary of sorrow,
So weary of struggling with sin,
So timid concerning the morrow,
So faithless of entering in
To the beautiful rest that remaineth
Secure in the city of God,
Where shall enter no evil that staineth,
Nor ever the spoiler hath trod.

But aye when the struggle is severest,
And dark are the clouds on my soul,
Dear Lord, the sweet cup that thou pourest
Has balm, and I drink and am whole.
From the quenchless old well of salvation
I quaff the pure waters divine,
And a sense of triumphant station
Is thrilled through this spirit of mine.

No hand but thine own, blessed Master,
Could comfort and cheer in the day
When the touch of a sudden disaster
Has cumbered and tangled the way.
No look but thine own could illumine
When night gathers black o'er the land,
And strength that is failing and human
Lies prone on the desolate strand.

But ever thy help is the nearest
When help from the earth threats none,
And ever the word that is dearest
Is the word of the crucified Son;
And aye when the tempest-clouds gather
I fly for sweet shelter and peace
Through the door to the heart of the Father,
That terror and tremor may cease.

He restoreth my soul, and I praise him
Whose love is my chrism and crown;
He restoreth my soul: let me raise him
A song that his mercy will own.
For often so weary of sorrow,
So weary of fighting with sin,
I look and I long for the morrow,
When the ransomed their freedom shall win.

THE SALOON IN POLITICS.

The discussion of this subject seems to me quite appropriate to the occasion. Perhaps the highest honor we can pay to the founders of our Government, is to accept with profound gratitude the blessings which, under God, they have transmitted to us, and to face with manly courage and patriotic determination whatever problems remain to be solved. Among those problems none are so grave and pressing, and none threaten consequences so disastrous to all that is most sacred in our institutions, as are involved in the American saloon system. Time will not permit me to even notice the multiform phases of this gigantic evil, which, in its tendencies, magnitude and destructiveness, is the most dangerous foe to the Republic, and the direst curse that afflicts mankind. I shall therefore waive for the present, those broader and higher moral considerations, which demonstrate the liquor traffic, as now carried on, to be the stupendous crime of the nineteenth century, and confine myself mainly to the political and economical features presented by the saloon in politics.

I insist that, considered merely upon the lower plane of political economy, there is no one subject now before the American people, at all comparable in gravity and importance to this one. It embraces and involves problems of taxation, industrial prosperity, material progress, political purity, general intelligence, social order, personal and domestic security, and even the foundations of the Government itself. In the wide sweep of its malign influence it touches, and threatens the very warp and woof of our social, political and industrial organisms.

How to curtail and finally destroy this evil is the great problem of the hour. Its solution stands next on the world's calendar of progress. It has been called for trial, and cannot be dismissed or postponed. The saloon has boldly entered politics, and it has come to stay until vanquished or victorious.

Briefly stated, the question is, Shall the Liquor Power, with its dire and deadly influences, rule and ruin, or shall it be utterly destroyed?

This malign Power has organized and massed its mighty forces for the conflict. It has raised the black flag, and proclaimed that he who will not swear allegiance to it, and thereby become particeps criminis in its work of destruction and death, shall politically perish. It has even drawn the assassin's knife, and lighted the torch of the incendiary, in order to inspire dismay in the ranks of its enemies. The time has therefore come when this issue must be met. Political parties can no longer dodge it if they would. Private citizens must take sides openly, for or against the saloon, with its methods and its results. "Neutrality is henceforth impossible; indifference is henceforth a betrayal of the trust involved in citizenship."

Let us therefore briefly inquire: What is the American Saloon System? What are its relations to politics? By what right does it exist? How shall it be utterly destroyed?

WHAT IS THE AMERICAN SALOON SYSTEM?

As now existing it is a thing of comparatively recent origin. The Rev. Canon Farrar says "It was only some 150 years ago that there began the distinctive sin of the dram-shop and the gin-palace. . . . Distillation replaced the comparatively harmless wines of our forefathers, by those poisonous draughts of liquid fire, which are at this moment the soothing, blighting and degrading curse of myriads—the fellest and the foulest temptation with which our working classes have to struggle." Within the memory of many present, this business has undergone a radical change, in several respects. The liquors sold are not as pure as they were in the days of our youth, when it was no uncommon thing to see old men who had been steady drinkers all their lives, and yet were apparently unharmed. Now the adulterations, and poisonous drugs which are added, make short work of human life. Twenty years ago the liquor shop was to some extent a branch of trade, supplying what was deemed a natural demand. Now the saloon system is an active agency deliberately organized, and encouraged by distillers and wholesale dealers, for the purpose of creating a market for the vast surplus on their hands. To accomplish this it hesitates at no methods, however monstrous. As pure liquors work too slowly for its purpose, poisonous drugs are deliberately added to inflame the stomach and increase the desire for drink, thereby increasing the demand. In the eloquent and truthful words of the National Anti-Saloon Republican Committee:

"It creates a demand where none before existed, that it may profit by supplying that demand. It artificially stimulates an evil habit, that it may thrive by pandering to it. It methodically breeds debauchery, poverty, anarchy and crime, for pay. It purposely seeks to multiply the number of drinkers, and hence of drunkards. It invades every new community, demands tribute from every home, and lies in wait with fresh enticements for each new generation of youth. . . . . Each one of our 200,000 drinking places forms a distinct centre of aggressive forces and skillful devices for spreading the drink habit among men. Every plausible temptation and solicitation that trained talent can suggest are used to entrap the young, the ignorant, the toiling and the homeless, with the knowledge that a customer once secured is usually a customer for life. . . . . Experience indicates that four-fifths of American drinking and drunkenness is due in the first instance, not to any natural appetite of our people, but to the presence and sleepless efforts of the gigantic engiery, working seven days a week and twenty-four hours a day, unrestrained by any scruple and everywhere contemptuous of public and private right."

This is by no means an overdrawn picture of a system, which insists upon the right, untrammeled by law or conscience, to manufacture drunkards, paupers and criminals, for pay, and then to cast them upon society to be supported or punished, itself meanwhile refusing to bear any part of the burden its work imposes. To maintain this right the saloon power has organized its vast forces, formed its political alliances, and now, conscious of its strength, bids open defiance to the law and public sentiment. To maintain the right to get money by the wholesale destruction of life, health and property, it corrupts the ballot, bribes legislatures, tampers with juries, and seeks to intimidate the weak and cowardly by arson and assassination. This brings me to consider the relation of the saloon to politics.

The statement would perhaps be more accurate to say, the relation of politics to the saloon; for in most of our cities the drinking saloon is the central power around which politics revolve, and which dictates candidates and party policies. Even in our National elections it sometimes exercises a controlling influence and decides Presidential contests. By the peculiar relation of political parties New York has become a pivotal state. The saloons rule the city, the city rules the state, and the state decides what shall be the ruling power for the Republic. We are, therefore, to all intents and purposes, a rum-ruled nation. We shall not be surprised at the ability of this organization to accomplish these results if we glance at its magnitude and resources.

Its claims to have, in the United States, $1,000,000,000 invested in the business of making and selling liquors. There are at least 500,000 direct employes. Millions of poor miserable victims and camp-followers stand ready to do its bidding. It is supported and defended by the vicious habits, appetites, passions and prejudices, of millions of our people. Its revenues are larger, and the percentage of profits far greater, as the statistics prove, than are derived from all of our 140,000 miles of railroad. Add to this, the disgraceful fact that, with these mighty resources at command, it has formed a close alliance, offensive and defensive, with one of the great political parties of the country. Is it any wonder, then, that such an organization, with such resources, and such political alliances, has become the ruling power in many parts of the Republic, and that it boldly proclaims its purpose of supreme political dominion? I do not pause to describe the hideous character of its rule in our cities and towns, where it has full sway, for your own experience and observation will speak more eloquently on that point than any words of mine. My purpose just now is to show that while we read with honest pride our grand and immortal Declaration of Independence, we are today the subjects of a tyrant more exacting, cruel, intolerant and hateful, than ever wielded a royal scepter, or disgraced a kingly crown.

Let a few facts, selected from the many at command, confirm this statement. Take, first, that which is among the least important—viz.,

It is estimated upon the best attainable authority that this tyrant's revels cost annually more than $700,000,000; that 500,000 victims, rendered worse than useless, are staggering along in his triumphal procession to dishonored graves; and that his army of immediate retainers—the makers and venders of "liquid fire"—numbers 500,000 more.

Estimating that this million of makers, venders and victims, if engaged in some legitimate business, could have earned $1.50 per day, we have a loss in productive power of $450,000,000 per annum, which, added to the $700,000,000 wasted for strong drinks, makes a total of $1,250,000,000. Add to this taxation—estimated at $100,000,000—for the support of jails, criminal prosecutions, penetentiaries, almshouses, pauperism, and all the unnumbered burdens imposed upon the country by this tyrant, and you have $1,350,000,000 as the annual cost of his reign. How does this compare with the administration of King George, or with the tax on the historic tea, that a century ago was put to steep in Boston Harbor?

Let it be borne in mind that this burden rests most heavily upon the poor, who are least able to bear it. It is doubtless true that a large portion of it is borne by the rich and prosperous, but if only one-half of it falls upon the wage-workers of the nation, there is an opportunity for an Anti-Poverty Society, with possibilities beyond the wildest dreams of Mr. George and Dr. McGlynn. Mr. Powderly, in a recent speech said, "In one Pennsylvania county, in a single year, $17,000,000 was spent for liquor, and it was estimated that $11,000,000 of the amount came from workingmen." The savings that could be made through an Anti-Saloon Anti-Poverty Society, would in ten years buy half the farms in the United States, and in fifteen years more furnish a fund large enough to purchase every railroad in the country, and pay for them more than their actual cost.—Hon. William Windom.

THE SACRIFICE OF THE BODY.

The constant tendency of a man's physical nature is to gravitate into sloth and sluggishness and consequent enfeeblement of health. This tendency is resisted by activity. Hence the value of work as a means of grace.

We need to stand guard against and beat back that languor and debility which are the result of a want of proper employment of our life-powers, and especially in God's service. There is no elixir of life for the body like the presence in it of God's Spirit. This is his saving health. This is the joy of the Lord which is our strength. It is just at this point that Satan seeks to defeat the purpose of our calling, by oppressing in us this new life from God which can vivify us in body as well as soul, and which certainly should overcome that heaviness which so clogs the spiritual life, and makes so many Christians dead lumber in the house of God where they ought to be "living stones."

And this leads us to speak further of the duty of standing guard at all the inlets of our life in the body against the invisible enemies of our salvation. Man's physical nature has long been a tramping-ground for these enemies. Satan and evil spirits enter into men now as truly as in the days of Judas and Ananias. The prince of the power of the air is still the spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience. Ephes. ii. 2. Our bodily appetites, our mental cravings and emotions, are all inlets which these enemies may enter. Around all the weak points of the fortress the enemy prowls. We have seen that our conflict is essentially a fight for the prize of inheritance and dominion in this vast system of God's works. Our interests involves the overthrow of the kingdom of darkness, and the advancement of a new race of kings and priests in embodied immortality on to the throne of power. It is a life-struggle therefore, which provokes Satan to great rage, for his time is short. And God's word is forever settled in heaven that the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head. This offering of our bodies, then, upon God's alter centers into the very heart of that conflict against principalities and powers about which he exhorts us so earnestly to stand fast, girt with the whole armor of God.

And let us never forget that, great as is this conflict they that be for us are more than they that be against us. Jesus is our Forerunner in it all. In a body like ours, he offered unto the Father the sacrifice of a perfect human life. He, through fierce temptations, in which he agonized unto the blood, subdued and held captive all these warring elements of which man's nature is the seat and bound them forever to his throne. And, through death, he gave the death-wound to him who hath power over them all. He rescued our nature, body and spirit, from his fatal dominion and raised it to the right hand of power in the heavens. And now he is the Friend and brother, the sympathetic High-Priest to every man who desires a like deliverance and trusts him for it.

And let no man imagine that because this is the path of restraint and self-denial, it may be of harsh discipline, that it is therefore a way of sorrow and gloom. Rough though this path may be, it opens out, even in this world, into new and glad regions of life. For it is the carnal mind which is death. While to be spiritually-minded is even now life and peace. And beyond, this path opens out into regions of unclouded light, of everlasting dominion and fulness of joy.—Mystery of Creation and of Man.

THE HOPE OF THE BRIDEGROOM.

It is, we believe, one of the excellent Boners who writes that, The hope of the sin-burthened earth, the hope of the oppressed nations, the hope of the groaning church, and the hope of the absent Lord himself, is his own last glorious coming. This fourfold hope centres in, and is only consummated by that stupendous divine manifestation,—the return of the heavenly Bridegroom, the reign of the King of kings. Even so. Matt. xxv. 10; Rev. xix. 16.

Please consider the question, does our Lord live and wait in hope? Most evidently, for "He is from henceforth expecting [ekdekomenos, waiting,] till his enemies be made his footstool," Heb. x. 13. In every other place, the Greek word, found eight times, is placed in connection with a promised, and therefore an expected event. Seven times men are thus said to wait, but here the Lord Christ is the waiting one, and waiting, he expects, and therefore hopes. The beginning of the season of expectation in his breast was his ascension, Heb. x. 12. The end of the waiting time of our Lord is the era of subjugation of this creation to his rule, the era of the destruction of death, the time of the completed restoration of the rebellious world to the Father's sovereign rule, 1 Cor. xv. 25–28. It is the end of the age. Therefore during all the long period of his tarry and intercession on the upper throne, Rev. iii. 21, our dear Lord is an expectant. His hope is not yet consummated; still greater joy is set before him; there remains for him a magnificent future, Luke i. 32, 33.

It only remains to suppose there exists in his sacred breast a holy yearning for the day of return and kingly rule to complete the fulness of this divine hope. Does he thus yearn? Who can doubt it? Would he bid the church pray for the divine kingdom, Matt. vi. 10; would he present her as the importunate widow in loud cries for justice and judgment, Luke xviii. 1–8; would he so repeatedly shout back from the upper throne to his Bride, "I am coming quickly," Rev. xxii.; would he make it a rare virtue to wish him here again, 2 Tim. iv. 8, were that returning nothing to him, were he uninterested in it, could he just as well remain where he is, and were he animated and inspired by no longing hope? Nay, verily. What then? Why, this should follow as day follows the rising sun—every Christian should enter into sympathy with the waiting, expectant, yearning Lord. And all other sympathy for lost man, all wishes, desires, hopes, should be subordinate to this. This sympathetic yearning, this harmony of purpose, this oneness of mind and desire, should be supreme in the breast of the Bride, and be all controlling. Massillion, the eloquent French preacher, said that a believer in the ranks of the early Christians who did not sigh after the return of the Lord was an apostate. Assuredly it was so deemed, or Tertullian had never penned for that church the words: "Our desires post after the end of this age, the passing away of the world at the great day of God." Hvade it as men may, ignore it as men will, here is a test of the professed believer's love for his divine Master. To say we love him, and yet not wish to see him, John xii. 21; to affirm devotion to him in absence, and yet dislike to think of his presence; to gush with endearing terms of affection and yet be dumb or vexed when his advent is mentioned, and of that advent say, the farther away the better—this is to blunder over the Bridegroom's message; nay, it is to play the hypocrite. Such protestation may well be doubted, such love must be false.

As the babe lovingly leaps to its mother's embrace, as the true bride longs to look in the face of her faithful Lord, as creation groans for its Restorer: so the church in unsuspected, unfaltering loyalty must long to see her King. Let us then tell him so. Let us shout it in the ears of the dead, unloving, disloyal professor. Let us thunder it to an evil world—his enemies. Let affection be centered where he is seated, Col. iii. 2. Let hope be twined about his sacred person, Col. i. 5. Let imagination view him gazing down on earth's countless sainted dead, and saying to the celestial hosts, "I go that I may awake them out of sleep," John xi. 11. Let yearning love cry out, "Come quickly," Rev. xxii. 20. Let fancy behold all heaven astir with magnificent preparation for the royal descent, the triumphant return, the mighty day of earth's Lord.

Let faith arise and climb the hills,
And from afar descry
How distant are His chariot wheels,
And tell how fast they fly.

A Literal Resurrection.

Modern theorizings, some with Swedenborg and some with German rationalism to lead the way, have attacked the literalness of the resurrection. A part teach that the resurrection takes place at death; that then we drop the material body, but that our immaterial —or psychical—body, in which the soul dwells, passes into another state of existence. Others say all this language about resurrection is figurative, only an intense form of expression to emphasize the wonderful transformation the soul experiences when it is set free from the bondage of its earthly body. It rises up, breaks forth into a new life, just as the soul does when the touch of God first comes upon it to quicken it when dead in its trespasses and sins. That is called a resurrection, and what occurs at death, or after death is only a more pronounced form of the same experience.

But neither of these views is what the Scriptures teach concerning this great truth. They set forth unequivocally and emphatically the doctrine of a literal resurrection of the body. No language could be more clear and decisive than the language they use. It is the bodies, not the souls, of men that are to rise again. "They that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth." John v. 28, 29. "He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii. 11. "Who shall fashion the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his 'glory.'" Phil. iii. 21, Rev. Ver. Then the mighty argument of the great apostle in that wonderful resurrection chapter, 1 Corinthians, xv., of itself ends all debate. The whole pith and force of it turns on the fact that Paul is speaking of the resurrection of the body. The seed that is put into the ground has a body, and that new growth which is developed therefrom has a body, and every seed has its own body, i. e., a growth-form peculiar to itself and given to it of God. There are also celestial bodies and bodies terrestrial, and each with its appropriate and divinely appointed glory. So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. "It"—the natural body—"is sown in corruption;" "it"—the spiritual body—"is raised in incorruption;" "it"—the natural body—"is sown in dishonor;" "it"—the spiritual body—"is raised in glory;" "it"—the natural body—"is sown in weakness;" "it"—the spiritual body—"is raised in power." The argument hangs absolutely upon the literalness of a bodily resurrection. It is this mortal that puts on immortality, this corruptible that puts on incorruption. It is not some awakening of the soul as from a sleep, nor some sudden development of it into a larger activity, nor some mystical dropping of its gross outer enswathement, and passing into a freer and higher state of existence. What the Scriptures teach is that the same body that is put into the ground is the body that is to be raised. Just as truly and literally of our bodies, and more, as it was of the body of the Lord Jesus Christ. He was the first fruits, and the harvest must needs be identical in kind with the first sheaf. He was the first-born from the dead of God's great redeemed family, and the rest of the household of faith must needs be like him. And this they clearly teach cannot be except by the literal resurrection of the body. No matter as to the question involved, what the difficulties may be, difficulties as to bodies burned and their ashes scattered to the four winds, or as to bodies drowned and devoured by the fishes of the sea, or as to bodies buried turned to dust, and their elements incorporated into trees, animals, or other human beings. These are God's questions, not ours. With him nothing is impossible, and the resources of omnipotence are as ample now as when they availed, however unphilosophically, or in contravention of natural law, to create a universe out of nothing, and make the original man out of the dust of the earth. Of one thing we may rest assured—whatever the pledges of his word, God will make them good in every jot and tittle. Our concern is not with the difficulties of the Word, but with its teachings. And these compel us to hold that these bodies are to be resurrected, and that in the resurrection, although transformed and ineffably glorified, they will be just as identical with what they now are as was the body of our risen Lord with the body laid in the tomb of Joseph. They will be literal, visible, glorious, just as his was, and because his was.

You have anticipated, no doubt, the force of this as related to the subject under discussion. The doctrine of resurrection not only makes our future bodily existence certain, but it conditions that future estate upon the bodily existence and return of our Lord. It is at "His coming" that the righteous dead are to be raised, and with believers then living are to be caught up to meet him in the air, and, as in the twinkling of an eye, changed into his image. I need not stop to cite the passages so familiar to all upon this point. 1 Cor. xv. 23–52; 1 Thes. iv. 14–17; Phil. iii. 20–21. But you will notice this: that the resurrection of the bodies of the dead saints and the transformation of the living saints is conditioned not only upon the fact that our Lord actually rose from the dead and that he is actually to return, but that at his coming he shall possess still his body, the identical body with which he left the tomb. For only so can the bodies of our humiliation be conformed unto the body of his glory. Only so can we see him as he is, and therefore be like him. Only so can we meet him in the air, and in our transformed and glorified bodies, the likeness of his own, abide with him forever more. It is, therefore, the clear necessity of the Scripture teaching as to the resurrection that our Lord's return should be literal, personal, visible. And this is precisely what we know it must be from other testimonies of the Word. For these require that he should come "in the clouds of heaven;" that "men shall see him," that "they that pierced him shall look upon him," and that he shall "come as the Redeemer to Zion," take the "throne of David" and "reign over the house of Jacob forever."—Matt. xxv. 30; Rev. i. 7; Zech. xii. 10; Isa. lix. 20; Luke i. 32.—E. P. Goodwin, D. D.

Asking and Receiving.

There is only one place where we are always sure of finding just the help we need. Sometimes we are not wise enough to know what is right; sometimes we are not strong enough to turn away from Satan when he tempts us; we need wisdom, we need strength, we need a guide. Jesus says to us: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Asking is not saying your prayers, but praying in earnest from your very heart; seeking is wanting help so much that you will let nothing hinder you from finding it; knocking is to ask and to keep on asking. Help for every one. Jesus says everyone who comes to God in this way will get what he wants—wisdom, help, a guide; God's own hand will lead him into the right way. We may be sure of this because God is our Father, who delights in helping us. Earthly parents, even if they are not very good, give their children food when they ask for it, and will not our Heavenly Father be as good as they are? God knows what is best. Children sometimes ask for things that would be very bad for them. The baby sometimes wants the bright light, or a sharp knife, but the mother will not give it to him. So we sometimes ask our Father in heaven for things which he knows would hurt us, and he is so good and wise he does not let us have them.

Slusser.—In Huntington, Huntington Co., Ind., Sept. 13, 1887, Lewis H. Slusser, aged 35 years.

He was born in Huntington Co., Ind., in 1852, and resided in his native county to the time of his death. He was baptized into Christ and became a member of the Church of God in 1882, since which time he has been a close student of the Bible and occasionally preached the word. The bright hopes he entertained of winning many to see the truth, as it is written, were suddenly blasted by the ruthless hand of death. He leaves a wife and three children, with many sympathizing friends to mourn his loss.

Brother Slusser was at all times a very earnest contender of the truths of the gospel; so deep were his convictions of the doctrines of our glorious hope, that even in the agonies of death he was led to exclaim, "Oh, I have such a glorious hope, for Jesus said: 'I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live;' and 'all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.'" Job. xiv. 14. When very near to death he was asked whom he desired to conduct his funeral services, he answered, "O, Father Chaplin, Brother Woodward, or some dear brother of my faith." We are very sorry to state that circumstances were such that this last wish of his could not be granted.

Our little church here at Clayaville will sadly miss his welcome presence. He has paid the pens. (wages) for "The wages of sin is death." He sleeps the sleep of the unconscious dead, for "His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish." Psa. cxlvi. 4. With all this what a glorious hope we have even if the grave has conquered him; we have a bright evidence in his life while among us that his life was hid with Christ. This is not all our hope, for Jesus said, "I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore, and have the keys of hell (grave) and of death." For when he comes in the clouds of heaven, with all his holy angels, unlocks the graves of the sleeping dead, brings them up out of the death state, clothes them with immortal life, then shall they know he is the Lord God. Then will our brother be able to shout, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

O, dear brethren and sisters, in all sincerity let us pray God to deepen our purity, enable us to all live more devoted and more willing to labor and sacrifice for his cause, till we are called to sleep in death, or to meet our soon-coming Lord. We must be like Christ in our disposition if we would be like him in the physical likeness through the resurrection. May we all meet in God's most glorious kingdom.

ONE THING NEEDFUL.

Ah what if the sighing and care
Be left for a time for another to bear,
When the soul that is eager to learn,
From the sordid lessons of earth would turn,
Coming where Mary came,
With the eyes and the heart aflame
To sit at the feet of Jesus,
To sit and learn of Jesus!

No labor profits that love is done,
Though riches be won and fame be won;
And earthly wisdom is foolish made,
And vain the pleasures that pall and fade;
Coming where Mary came,
With the eyes and the heart aflame
To sit at the feet of Jesus,
To sit and learn of Jesus.

"One thing is needful" the Master said,
And nought may stand in the place stead.
Laying the burdens and care adown,
To run the race for the golden crown;
Coming where Mary came,
With the eyes and the heart aflame
To sit at the feet of Jesus,
To sit and learn of Jesus.

God Cares for Me.

I stood in the door at eventide,
My heart was full of fears;
And I saw the landscape before me lie,
Through mists of burning tears—
I thought to myself, the world is dark,
No light nor joy I see;
Nothing but toil and want is mine,
And no one cares for me.

A sparrow was twittering at my feet,
With its beautiful auburn head,
And looked at me with dark, bold eyes,
As it picked up crumbs of bread;
And said to me in words as plain
As the words of a bird could be:
"I'm only a sparrow, a worthless bird,
But the dear Lord cares for me."

A lily was growing beside the hedge,
Beautiful, tall and white,
And it shone through the glossy leaves of green,
Like an angel clothed in white;
And it said to me, as it waved its head
On the breezes, soft and free,
"I'm only a lily, a useless flower,
But the Master cares for me."

Then it seemed that the hand of the loving Lord
Over my head was laid,
And he said to me: "O faithless child,
Whereforе art thou dismayed?
I clothe the lilies, I feed the birds,
I see the sparrows fall;
Nothing escapes my watchful eye,
My kindness is over all."

THE STORY OF ISAAC LEVINSOHN.
No. 2.

SEARCHING FOR SATISFACTION.

My trouble of mind was such that my father desired me to give up study, and, instead, to enter upon some business pursuit. I found employment in an office, but after some months was constrained to tell my father and the Rabbi I could not continue in any other work than that of God.

This pleased them much, so I began again to study the Bible every morning and evening. With much surprise I read these words of the Psalmist, "There is none that doeth good, no, not one," liii. 3. This made me perfectly sure I should never go to heaven. Even the Bible informs me so, I said, for I am not righteous. I went again to my mother, begging her to tell me "what to do to be saved." She cried bitterly and replied, it will be well with you, if you continue in the written and Oral laws."

After months of misery and despair, I became very ill and sank into despondency. In vain I sought to feel that the God of our fathers was to God and Father, and to realize his Fatherly love.

The physician who visited me thought my recovery doubtful. Upon hearing this my mother fell upon my bed and, with bitter lamentations, kissed me, saying, "My dear, I remember you asked me several times what to do to be saved; you also told me you were afraid to die because of your sinnership before God. How do you feel now?"

With all the energy left me I replied, "I am lost! I am lost!" Then lifting up my hands and heart to the Lord, said with the Psalmist: "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law," (cxix. 18), and fell back exhausted and unable to speak for several days and nights.

The Rabbi and others came to see me; thinking it would be the last time, they engaged in prayer and repeated many Psalms of David, a custom generally practised in houses of sickness.

Being able to speak a little, I said, "Pray that the Lord may open my eyes, that I may know the God of our fathers as my God, and it shall suffice me."

The Lord heard my prayer; I began to recover, and after a few weeks was restored to health.

Then I told my father that I must leave my native land and search for, if possibly I could find, that for which my soul longed. His wishes to the contrary were of no avail, and it is impossible for me to express the determination which filled my mind.

One night while reading the Gemara, I fell asleep, when suddenly awaking, these words of Genesis xii. 1, "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee," so riveted themselves to me in such a way that I could not possibly shake them off. So I said to my father that, with or without his permission, I must go, and if I die, I die! but I must go! Upon this he consented, praying that wherever I went the God of Israel might be with me.

In July, 1871, my father invited several friends and relations to his house, to see me before I left my home, and to join in persuading me to remain. It was a heartbreaking time, but I could only say, if I cannot go, I cannot, must not live! Then all began to comfort me, and to wish me success in my journey. I was then sixteen years of age.

The morning of my departure came, and many assembled to bid me farewell! In the afternoon we started to the railway station some five miles off, about one hundred people following us. The eyes of my beloved mother were dim with tears, and her tenderness of heart, and the thought that I should never meet with any one in this world with such love, filled me with grief. My father, as he bid me farewell, put his hands upon my head, and said, "May the God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Jacob, our fathers, keep and preserve thee near to his holy word, the Bible, and to the holy writings of our holy Rabbis," and I replied "Amen and Amen."

The train started. The assembled friends, with my most beloved father and mother, who had a babe in her arms, lifted up their hands, and from the railway carriage I saw my mother faint away. Never shall I forget that time. I, too, fell upon the floor of the carriage fainting, but was revived by the people around; then, whilst sitting in the carriage, I lifted up my voice and prayed unto the Lord to take me in his arms, and be my Father, Mother, Brother, and Friend, yea, my All in all.

The train brought me to the small town, Vorbelow, on the Russian frontier. The boundary of Russia is here marked by a wide ditch, full of water, some parts of which are shallow, while others are deep. No one is permitted to cross the boundary, unless by permission from the government. It is the law of Russia, that whoever wishes to leave the country must have a special passport from the chief governor of the province, and no passports are granted to young men who are not likely to return, especially if it is probable they will be wanted for the military conscription. I had no permission. When evening came on I entered the house of a Jew, and requested to be allowed to stay there the night, but the house was very small, and there was no room. They asked if I would go up on the roof to sleep, which I was glad to do.

About six o'clock in the morning I got up and started on my way, looking wistfully at the boundary and at the soldiers on duty, who shoot any one attempting to cross without permission. I hid in a cornfield some time and watched the soldiers, and found to my joy they had not noticed me. I took off my boots that I might run the more quickly, and, when the soldiers had gone a few yards in the opposite direction, ran with all my speed, crossed the broad ditch and hid myself in the cornfield on the other side.

Then the soldiers caught sight of me and fired, but I ran on through the cornfield and escaped.

By and by I came to a small village in Germany, where I took the train to Koningsberg. In the carriage a young man introduced himself to me and appeared to be polite. We were alone, and I was weary and fell asleep. As the train neared the station, I heard the door shut and found the young man had jumped out of the carriage. He had picked my pockets. I informed the station-master what had happened, who immediately sent off half a dozen gendarmes to search for him, and in a very short time back came a gendarme with the thief bound to his horse. The culprit had been found sitting under a tree counting out the money from my purse!

Having regained my money, I proceeded to Koningsberg, where I stayed a few weeks, but my soul found no satisfaction there.

From Koningsberg I went to Berlin, and wrote to my parents. My father replied, wishing me God's blessing, and hoping that I should not go farther away.

I obtained a situation as junior clerk in Berlin, but as the Jews in Germany are not very pious, nor so particular in their rites and worship as the Jews of Russia and Poland, I wrote to my father informing him that I must leave that country.

"My darling child," he replied, "I cannot tell how we feel for you. Every day your mother sheds tears, and laments because our Isaac is not with us. Dear child, we rejoice if you would return home. Your mother says, since her dear child has gone, the joy and comfort of her heart has departed from her.....For God's name sake, keep the commandments very strictly—the Oral and written laws. May they be the object of your life, and your near companions. Try and keep your phylacteries perfect. And may the God of our fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and of Jacob be with you, Amen. Adieu, adieu, adieu."

My answer was, that I felt it was not the will of God that I should stop in Germany or return to Russia. Since leaving home, I wrote, I had not had one happy hour, but every night bitterly lamented the comforts left behind. But still, my letter continued, on I must go, a long journey, till the God of our fathers should satisfy my soul, adding, "Dear mother, I shall never forget you! Yea, I cannot help thinking of you every moment, and shall do so."

I left Berlin for Hamburg on foot, desiring to see Germany, and, after walking three or four hours, I overtook two young men—one a Pole, the other a Prussian—who said they were travelling to England, but intended seeing Germany, Saxony, Hanover, Brunswick and Austria first, and with them I journeyed.

Not having passports, we were not permitted to lodge anywhere, for it was not long after the French and German war, and the inhabitants were very particular; so we slept in cornfields, or woods, or cemeteries, and often lay down weary and tired to get up drenched with rain.

One day we came to a wood, and while I was asleep, my companions stole the money out of my pockets, took away my bundle of clothes from under my head, and left me. Not having money nor change of clothes, I did not know what to do, and, as I lifted up my face heavenward, cried unto the Lord, "Lead me in thy truth."

For several hours I walked straight on. Then the night came and I was alone, weary and hungry. On, on I went in the darkness, weeping and praying, till I saw a light shining in the distance; it was a very long way off, and looked very small. I kept it before my eyes for about two hours, and then came to it. It was a candle in the window of a farmhouse.

In answer to my knock an old lady opened the door, asking who I was. "I am a poor Jew boy, going to England; I am hungry and weary; I think I am dying," was my reply. She welcomed me in, gave me food and a bed to sleep on, and in the morning set me on my way.

I hastened to the nearest village which was about eighteen miles off. The piece of bread, which the kind old lady had given me was eaten, and, after some hours walking, I entered a large forest. There I met an old man, and asked him if he would give me a piece of bread. He did so with pleasure, but the bread was buttered, and, as a Jew, I would not eat butter made by Christians; so I was obliged to refuse his bounty, and had to go on hungry as I was. After walking for about four hours more I lost my way, and lay down in the forest, and fell asleep. When I awoke the night had come on and I was alone in the darkness.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "3" and reads "Jny3" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1883. "Feb" February, "Mar" March "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

The Church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday in V. Ile Blind and Heller's Block, Room 26, 275½ Ontario

THE COMING AGE IMMENSE REDUCTION.

From $4.00 to $2.50

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind. Among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar issues, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING—Marks the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of startling and absorbing interest. It sets largely in political history, showing in a clear and unmistakable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason, it outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of bygone ages and shows that the same hand is the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will by it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $3.00. Send to the office for this work.

THE SEVENTH-DAY. No. 7.

[Copyrighted, 1887.]

ORIGIN AND WORK OF THE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST MOVEMENT.

The seventh-day Adventist denomination originated in the Advent movement of Wm. Miller in 1843–4. All the founders of the seventh day Adventist church, and nearly all its leading men since, were in Miller's work. The main point in their faith today is that they are still holding on to and carrying forward the work which Mr. Miller started. That work, the setting of the time both in 1843 and again in 1844, was just right, was in the special providence of God, and was the "first message" of Rev. xiv. 6, 7; the announcement that all prophetic periods had ended, Rev. x. 6, and the judgment had begun. Thus Elder L. Smith says: "They believe the chronological argument of the great Advent movement of 1844 was all right." ("The Seventh-day Adventist," p. 3.) Mrs. White thus states a revelation she had about it: "The Lord showed me that the 1843 chart was directed by his hand, and that no part of it should be altered; the figures were as he wanted them; that his hand was over and hid a mistake in some of the figures." ("Present truth," vol. I., Nov., 1850.) "I saw that God was in the proclamation of time in 1843." "Prophetic time closed in 1844." "Woe to him who shall move a block or stir a pin in these messages." ("Spiritual gifts," vol. I., pp. 133, 148, 168.)

Thus the seal of heaven is placed on the work, the figures, the setting of time, etc., both in 1843 and in 1844, though both failed! Thus seventh day Adventists to the end of time, with all their scholars, theologians and colleges, are pledged to stand by all the mistakes of that move because a young girl who was totally ignorant of all history and all chronology saw that it was right!

Mr. Miller and the great body of the Adventists soon saw that they had been mistaken in the time, and honestly confessed it. Soon after 1844 a little handful of Adventists embraced the seventh day Sabbath from the seventh day Baptists, and drew off from the main body on that issue. J. B. Cook and T. M. Preble, the starters of the move, soon saw that it was a mistake, and gave it up, but the idea had caught. Elders Bates, White, Mrs. White and others took it up and went on with it. But surely a mistake had been made somewhere, for the end did not come as predicted. Again Mrs. White had a revelation which settled this point. She says: "I was then shown what did take place in heaven, as the prophetic periods ended in 1844." ("Spiritual gifts," vol. I., p. 168.) It was this: Miller said this earth was the sanctuary of Dan. viii. 14, and that it would be cleansed by fire at the end of 2,300 days, in 1844. As the time passed and the earth was not burned, seventh day Adventists now figured it out that the sanctuary was not the earth at all. There was the mistake, and the only mistake in the whole move. The sanctuary is a building in heaven exactly like the temple on earth. The cleansing of the sanctuary, which was set for 1844, was the work of the judgment, which began in heaven that very year! This was only a slight mistake, not material to the work. So the time, 1844, was right after all, but the event was a little different from what had been expected and preached! The arguments are now removed from the troublesome facts of earth to the beautiful theories of heaven where such little mistakes are not so easily proved. All seventh day Adventists have unbounded faith in this explanation of the disappointment of 1844. All who opposed and rejected Miller's work of 1844 were rejected of God and hopelessly lost. "Babylon is fallen," Rev. xiv. 8, is the "second message" given by them about the close of 1844, announcing that all the churches, except themselves, were rejected of God and lost. Of them Mrs. White says: "I saw the state of the churches since the second angel proclaimed their fall. They have been growing more and more corrupt.... Satan has taken full possession of the churches as a body.... The churches were left as were the Jews, and they have been filling up with every unclean and hateful bird. I saw great iniquity and villanies in the churches; yet they profess to be Christians. Their profession, their prayers and their exhortations are an abomination in the sight of God. Said the angel, God will not smell in their assemblies. Selfishness, fraud and deceit are practiced by them without the reproving of conscience.... Jesus and the angels look upon them in anger." ("Spiritual gifts," vol. II., pp. 189, 190.) As this is a divine revelation, the whole seventh day Adventist denomination implicitly accepts this view of all the rest of Christendom.

Now the seventh day Adventists are giving the "third angel's message" of Rev. xiv. 9–12. This is the last message to a lost world. Its object is to gather out of the fallen churches and the world a pure people without fault, to be translated when Jesus comes, which is soon to occur. Of these there will be just 144,000—no more, no less. To accomplish this work, God in his providence, has reserved the light on the Sabbath till now. It is now the one great test of acceptance with God. See "Early writings," p. 27. With it the 144,000 will be sealed for translation. All who reject the Sabbath will be lost. Hence the Sabbath must now be preached, pushed and urged in private, in public, by voice and pen, among the churches and into the world, as rapidly as possible.

Sunday is the mark of the beast, and all who are keeping it when Christ comes will be lost. The United States is the beast of Rev. xiii. 11–18. Here church and state will soon unite and pass a Sunday law to prosecute seventh day Adventists. They will not be allowed to buy or sell, their property will be confiscated, and they will have to flee to the mountains to save their lives. See "Spiritual gifts," p. 201. The present reform and temperance movements will bring all this about. This will explain the unbounded zeal of our Sabbatarian people to push the Sabbath as they do. Mrs. White, their divinely-inspired prophetess, has been shown all this; hence they know it is so without a doubt.

These are the leading ideas around which all others cluster. I, myself, believed all this for many years, and advocated it with all my might, as tens of thousands well know. Some thirty thousand believe it now, and their numbers are increased yearly, and the work is spreading to the ends of the earth.

However, as the years went by, I came to see more and more very serious objections, both to the theory and to its practical workings, till at last they became so manifest to me that I was compelled, with a sad heart, to give it up as an error. Some few of my reasons for this I will now give very briefly, though I might fill volumes with them. It is difficult to handle a wounded man without hurting him. So I fear I cannot point out the failures in this work without grieving those who believe and love it; yet truth and the love of souls is more precious than any man's feelings. Besides, if these people are in error, they should be thankful to be shown that error, though this is seldom the case. I have the kindest of feelings towards these brethren, and would help them if possible, for I am sure they are engaged in a work which is bound to be a failure and bring disaster to them in the end.

From the first there has been a vein of secrecy and an effort to cover up something, which I am sure tends to evil. Such an odium attached to the Millerite disappointment of 1844 that seventh day Adventist ministers on entering new places were careful to keep out of sight the fact that they were in reality that same people. So other objectionable features of the faith, such as Mrs. White's visions, the fall of the churches, Sunday the mark of the beast, etc., are carefully kept back till a foothold has been obtained in the confidence of the people. Their colporters and canvassers have as far as possible, without telling a direct falsehood, covered up the fact that they were selling seventh day Adventist books. Their city missionaries do the same thing. They introduce themselves into houses under a name which will give no clue as to who they are, only that they are "city missionaries." All good people will of course favor and assist them, and even ministers will open the way for them, till at last they find out who they are. I know that these things are so, for I have been perfectly familiar with it all for twenty-eight years. Now, these persons do not mean to be deceitful, but their great zeal for what they call "the truth" betrays them into questionable methods of advancing it. But God's truth needs no deception to carry it forward. A short time since thousands of names were obtained from the W. C. T. U., ostensibly to send them temperance literature, but when the door had thus in confidence been opened, advantage was taken of it, and strong Sabbatarian literature was sent to all those names. Ministers and others who had under a false pretence been led to send them these names were justly indignant. But these good brethren laughed and thought they had done a smart thing. But was it fair and honorable? Again, it has always been a well understood fact with them that "new fields," where this people are entirely unknown, are by far the best fields for success. Where they are well and long known they can do little or nothing. Why is this so? Because the thing does not wear. Their old conferences in the east, where the work began, have a hard struggle to hold their own. New fields away from home is where they make their best gains. This looks badly for any cause.

Then it can not be denied that their work is largely to proselyte. Their faith necessarily leads them to this. All others are in the dark, breaking God's law. Hence, they will work just as hard to convert a devoted Christian to their views as they will to convert an infidel, and rejoice over his conversion just as much. They have many "city missions," but what is their work? Do they go among the destitute, the vicious, the paupers, the fallen, the drunkards, the orphans and homeless, and help them? Not a bit of it. They go among the best society to which they can obtain access, into Christian families, if possible, and bend all their efforts to get them to keep Saturday instead of Sunday. They will work months with one family to accomplish it. If they can get enough members out of a church to break it up, they rejoice over it greatly, as their reports any week will show.

They take great pride in their foreign missions, but what is their work? Is it to convert the heathen or carry the gospel to those who know it not? No, indeed; they make not the slightest efforts that way. They simply go to lands already Christianized and win as many as possible to their views. I became sick and tired of helping to maintain such work and longed to preach the simple gospel to lost sinners.

Another thing I have always noticed: when we enter a town the churches all oppose us, but the disaffected members, the infidels and opposers of religion, will be our warm friends, talk for us and shout when we show up the weaknesses of other churches. This looks a little suspicious. Then, also, large numbers come to believe the doctrine, and so lose all faith in other churches and will not go near them any more; but neither will they keep the seventh day and go with the Adventists. So they go nowhere, become wholly irreligious and disregard all days. This is bad fruit.

According to my best judgment, at least one third of all the companies raised up are left to go down and die out. This leaves that community and those members in a far worse condition religiously than before the Sabbath was preached there. Bad fruit again. Often, during the first few weeks of an effort in a new place, the attendance is larger, and it looks as though it would be the largest church in town. But as their peculiar doctrines are brought out, the attendance drops off till in a few months, not one soul attends their meetings, except those who keep the seventh day. This is invariably the result. They have no preaching, as the minister always leaves them alone after a few weeks; their meetings are held on Saturday when everybody is at work, and often held in a private house or some out of the way place to save rent. The consequence is that they soon become a little, isolated society all by themselves, with no interest in anything else. To "spread the truth" and make converts to their faith is the one absorbing passion of all, old and young. All the time and means they can spare go this way. As a rule, they take little interest in anything else. As a denomination, they do far less outside of their own membership, for the poor, the destitute, the drunken, and unfortunate classes, than any other church with which I am acquainted. Intense devotion to their doctrine is the one great thing. Deeds of charity, efforts to benefit society generally, and make things better now, are secondary matters, good enough for those who have nothing better to do. Hence, practically, I can not see that keeping the seventh day does people a particle of good. They are no more spiritual, benevolent, kind-hearted, patient, or devoted to good works than other Christians. Many live all alone in a community where there is no church of their own. They will not attend other churches nor let their children go. So they come up without any religious privileges.

Many of them, when old enough to do as they choose, will keep neither Saturday nor Sunday, and so their influence on society is bad. Then their members never take any part nor join in any religious efforts outside of their own church, but rather talk and work against anything of the kind done by others. A thorough Seventh-day Adventist feels sad when he sees a revival among other churches and members joining them. He has no confidence in the work, for Mrs. White says of all these revivals: "These who professed a change of heart, had only wrapt about them a religious garb which covered up the iniquity of a wicked heart. Some appeared to have been really converted, so as to deceive God's people; but if their hearts could be seen they would appear as black as ever." "Present truth," Vol. I., No. 2, p. 32. This he believes; hence he would rather his friends should remain non-professors than to have them profess religion in any of the churches. This is an ugly feature of that system. It makes people narrow, uncharitable and useless in religious work.

All the reformations of the past, which are now recognized as of God, bore a very different stamp from this. Look at those by John the Baptist, by Jesus, by his apostles, by Luther, Calvin, Wesley and the like. They got hold on the public heart and conscience; they influenced the irreligious masses generally to a better life; their influence for good was felt far outside of their own immediate church membership; they preached Christ and a simple gospel which could easily and quickly be understood, even by the most simple or ignorant.

Notice how different it is with a false religious movement. Take the followers of Mrs. Southcott, of Mrs. Ann Lee, the Shakers, of Swedenborg, or the Mormons, the followers of Joseph Smith. In each case some pretended prophet or prophetess stands at the head; all other churches but themselves are apostate; something else than Christ and the simple gospel is made the prominent object; a long, complicated, fanciful system of doctrine, radically different from that generally accepted by the great body of the Christian church, is presented; no public good comes of it, either to society or to religion; proselyting is the main business; and a little, isolated sect entirely shut up to itself, is the result. And that is exactly what seventh-day adventism is in almost every particular. Mrs. White stands at the head as an inspired prophetess; all other churches are "Babylon" and apostate; keeping the Sabbath is the one great thing; their system of doctrine is so long and complicated that a minister needs to give about sixty "lectures" to decently present it to the people; the result is a small, weak company, entirely secluded from all else. I do not mean by this that seventh day adventists are a bad, immoral class of people, like Mormons, for they are not. I think I have spoken plainly enough as to their moral character and sincerity so as not to be misunderstood, except by those who will want to misunderstand and misrepresent what I say, and they will do it anyway. It bears neither the marks nor the fruit of a genuine gospel reformation. Then it has failed entirely of accomplishing the results expected and promised. The Sabbath test was to separate out the wheat from the chaff, the good from the bad. Thus Mrs. White says: "I saw that the holy Sabbath is, and will be, the separating wall between the true Israel of God and unbelievers, and that the Sabbath is the great question to unite the hearts of God's dear waiting saints." "I saw that the present test on the Sabbath could not come until the mediation of Jesus in the holy place was finished." 1844. "Early writings," pp. 27, 33. "The seal of God is the holy Sabbath." "Thoughts on Revelations," p. 453. Here we have it in plain English. Not faith in Jesus, but the Sabbath is now the test; not devotion to Christ, but keeping the seventh day, is what separates between saints and sinners; not the Holy Spirit, Eph. iv. 30, but the Sabbath, is the seal of God!

Verily, this is "another gospel," Gal. i. 6, 7, which Paul never preached, and concerning which the New Testament is totally silent. How different this sounds from the teachings of the apostles, where a heart made pure by faith in Christ is the only test of discipleship. Let us see now how this new gospel has worked. If the Sabbath is now the test of acceptance with God, if it is the seal of God, if it does separate between the true Israel and unbelievers, then all who keep the seventh day have stood the "test," have the seal of God, and are the true Israel, saints of God, every one of them. Either this is so, or else the Sabbath as a "test," "seal" or "separating wall" is a failure. And if it is a failure here, then the whole seventh day Adventist doctrine is a failure, for their idea of the Sabbath as a test and seal is the corner stone of the whole system, as every one of them knows. How has it worked?

Now, after a trial of forty-four years it is found that keeping Saturday does not shut out bad men and poor material at all. Sabbatarians have just as large a share of undesirable adherents as other churches. There are hundreds all through their ranks of whom they would be glad to be rid. Hundreds have to be expelled every year, others censured, and others merely tolerated. They have frequent church trials, sad and balky members, and perplexing difficulties, just the same as other churches—no more, no less. With these they have also some noble men, large-hearted and true, with "devout women not a few," and fine young people who would be an ornament to any church. But all churches have these, as well, and just as large a share of them. So where is the great benefit of keeping Saturday? The theory was that the cross and disadvantages of keeping Saturday were so great that none but honest, self-sacrificing, God-fearing people would embrace it. Hence it was that Mrs. White saw that keeping the Sabbath was now the test of a holy life. This is what I thought when I embraced it, and began preaching it. But, alas! how soon the pretty delusion vanished when tried. With the good there always comes in also to keep the day, a lot of the riffraff, irresponsible, good-for-nothing class, who are the shame of all churches. Elder White used to say that the devil sent them along to disgrace the truth! Any way, there they are in the Sabbatarian ranks, just the same as among Sunday keepers. Stingy men, dishonest men, liars, adulterers, thieves, passionate and quarrelsome men, along with the good, are found keeping Saturday the same as among Sunday keepers. I could name several of the most prominent and successful ministers in that church who had to be silenced for adultery, while zealously urging everybody to keep Saturday! I do not mention this to show that that church is morally worse than people who observe Sunday. God forbid that I should say or insinuate any such thing, for I know better. Such things are not countenanced by that church, but are a great grief to its good members. All churches are more or less troubled by the same thing, fight against it as they may. But these sad facts do prove that the keeping of the seventh day Sabbath is not that test of Christian character and fitness for heaven which Mrs. White and the seventh day Adventists have claimed.

I have personally known scores of individuals who keep the seventh day who are not even professors of religion at all, and, according to their numbers, backslidden Sabbatarians are as common as backslidden Sunday keepers. So as a test it is a failure, and every Seventh-day Adventist knows that this is so. Besides, here is the whole "Marion party" in the west, zealous Sabbatarians, but they are denounced as "rebels" by seventh day Adventists. Then there are 8,000 seventh day Baptists, and several other small sects, who keep Saturday. Are they all sealed, ready for translation? No, for seventh day Adventists are as anxious to proselyte them as anybody, and regard them as little better than the Sunday churches.

After twenty-eight years of the most extensive acquaintance with the seventh day Adventist work and that people, I have failed to see any good that has come to anyone from keeping that day, while many evils have grown out of it, as mentioned above. Hence, if the observance of that day is not really required by God, if it is simply a mistaken notion that it ought to be kept, then it is a great misfortune to fall into that error. "Bondage," Gal. v. 1, is the word which exactly expresses the feeling of unpleasantness which, in a majority of cases, goes with the effort to keep the seventh day. How keep that day from choice, but because they feel that they must do it or be lost. Specially is it disagreeable to children and youth to be kept in while all others are at play or work, and to have to work while all others go to church. In this way many grow up with a dislike for all religion, and keep no day.

Then, too, a spirit of legalism does, more or less, go with the keeping of the seventh day. It is impossible that it should be otherwise, from the fact that the law and the Sabbath are, and have to be, almost constantly dwelt upon in order to hold their people and convert others to their faith.

I do not think that a copy of the Advent Review for thirty years past could be found in which there was not an argument in some way about keeping the law or the Sabbath. They affirm and teach that righteousness is keeping the law, notwithstanding Paul says, "If righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain." Gal. ii. 21. The duty to keep the law, to obey, and to sacrifice, the danger of disobedience, and the reward of obedience, are so constantly urged upon them that the common mind comes to feel that salvation is the reward of what they do. Hence, with many their service to God is largely a service of legalism. They hope to be saved because they keep the commandments. The freedom, the joy, the peace, the pardon, which come through simple faith in Jesus are seldom spoken of. I do not say that this is true of all, but I do say that it is true of large numbers of them. I have often seen persons embrace the Sabbath who were all alive and active and full of spirituality. In one year it was all gone. A spirit of fear, of self-condemnation and of bondage would come over them. They could not tell the reason themselves. But the answer is easy—legalism. Any system which does not make Christ first and last, all and in all, the theme of every thought and teaching, is not the gospel of the New Testament. I believe as strongly as anyone can in obeying God strictly in all he requires; but to obey God in order to be saved is one thing—legality; and to obey him because you have been forgiven is quite another thing—the gospel. What was the trouble with the Galatians? Had they professedly repudiated Christ as their Savior, and faith in him as the condition of forgiveness? Not at all. They knew better than that. But they did urge the keeping of abolished law and expired rites as necessary to salvation. Compare Gal. ii. with Acts xv. "Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved." Here was their test. Now our seventh day brethren are taking a similar course by urging as a test, obedience to the Jewish Sabbath, which expired at the cross.

THE RESTITUTION.

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three months' trial subscriptions, 50 cents.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine of "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the covenants of the anthem ("the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

How?

The little word at once arrests the attention when we read the passage, "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" How? Is there any way open, other than God's way? If we neglect his salvation, where are we going to turn? Is there any other name given under heaven except the name of Jesus?

God once appointed cities of refuge for places of escape for those who should accidentally kill any one. Outside of the appointed place there was no safety. If the person neglected the means of salvation the relatives of the slain man might kill him wherever found.

God has given us a place of refuge. It is his own name, and the name of his dear Son. If we confess our sins, forsake them and hide in Jesus, we shall be safe in the day of judgment, we shall live forever. Jesus will be our refuge. Like those men of old we must run for life.

All sinners who seek to hide somewhere else besides in Jesus will be put to death in the judgment. We cannot hide from God.

Yet there are many who think they can escape. They put on their own good deeds, they hide in little mountains of alms, giving in hills of honest dealing, in great towering peaks of munificent gifts to the Lord, but they never bow in submission to God; they forget that to obey is better than sacrifice and to hearken than the fat of rams.

The little word obedience is in God's way to the kingdom, and they can never cross over by so hard a way. It holds in itself the key into the place of safety, but they will lay no hand on the key.

How? how? shall they escape? It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. Today if you will hear his voice harden not your hearts.

The Lamb of God Approved for Sacrifice.

"Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." John i. 29.

"We are reminded that he is the Spotless Lamb—a lamb without blemish and without spot. Now I need not remind you who are at all familiar with the Old Testament history, how important it was that the lamb that was offered up should be without blemish. So vital was this, that it was required that the priest who was appointed for the purpose should carefully inspect the victim that had been selected, to be sure that there was no blemish in it, and then seal it with the Temple seal in token that it was fit for sacrifice and for food; and now we find our Lord Jesus Christ taking up the thought, and saying, "Labor not for the meat that perisheth, but for that meat that endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto you; for him hath God the Father sealed." On the banks of the Jordan, the heavens opened, and the Spirit descended like a dove, and rested upon him, and God spoke saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."—A. J. Gordon.

It was expected that Bro. R. S. Dwiggins would attend the Conferences at Watson, Mich., but poor health, as we understand, prevented him from going from home at that time.

EDITORIAL TRIP TO MICHIGAN.

Early in the summer of 1883 it was our privilege to attend a conference held at Meadon, Mich., at which time we formed a very pleasing acquaintance with many of the brethren and sisters residing in that State. During that meeting, if we rightly recollect, it was our privilege to deliver three discourses on different subjects. Again in the latter part of Sept. 1885, we attended a conference held at Watson in the same State, renewed our acquaintance with some, with whom we had met at Meadon, and, at the same time, formed the acquaintance of several others of like precious faith. At this meeting we delivered three discourses. On Sunday, Sept. 27, eleven persons, mostly in the morning of life, yielded the obedience of faith and were baptized in one of the beautiful Sylvan-bordered lakes of that region by Bro. Woodward. At both of the above meetings there were others who proclaimed the glorious gospel of God's dear Son, but in just what order, we do not recollect. From the acquaintance thus formed it resulted that we were requested to visit Watson again this year with which request we felt it our duty and privilege to comply. Accordingly on Wednesday, Sept. 28, 1887, we took the noonday train at Plymouth, and staid at a Boarding House over night in Fort Wayne. This city is the capital of Allen Co., and is situated on an elevated plain at the confluence of the St. Mary's and St. Joseph's rivers which unite to form the Maumee. This inland city contained in 1870, 17,738 inhabitants, which number has since been largely increased. The following important railroads intersect at this point, viz:—Toledo, Wabash and Western; Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne, and Chicago; Fort Wayne, Jackson, and Saginaw; Fort Wayne, Muncie, and Cincinnati; Grand Rapids, and Indiana; and the New York, Chicago, and St. Louis Railway, otherwise known as the Nickel Plate. These railroads give the place ample facilities for travel and commercial transportation. It is recorded that the site of the town was visited as early as 1700 by the French, for the purpose of trading with the Indians. Early in this century they established a trading post here, and afterward built a fort, named Fort Miami. In 1760, the British built a fort on the east bank of the St. Joseph's near its mouth. On the 17th of September, 1794, Gen. Anthony Wayne, a commander of Revolutionary celebrity, arrived with the army under his command, on the site of the deserted Miami village, which stood at the confluence of the St. Joseph and St. Mary's. On the following day, Sept. 18th, Gen. Wayne reconnoitered the ground, and selected the site for a fort, which was completed by Oct. 22nd, and garrisoned by a strong detachment, composed of infantry and artillery, which was placed under the command of Col. John F. Hamtramck, who gave to the new fortification the name of FORT WAYNE—a name by which it was always subsequently known, and which name it retains as a city at the present time. In this paper we cannot stop to narrate the history of remarkable persons and events connected with this place. Romanism, in its Papal form, has a strong foothold here, as well as in many other cities. For the disappearance of this, and all other forms of evil, the saints of God must patiently await the introduction of the times of the Messiah. On Thursday, Sept. 29, we took our seat on board of a car connected with the regular train on the Indiana and Grand Rapids Railway,—a good and well-managed road, passing through a pleasant and productive part of the country both in Indiana and in Michigan. At Rome City, in Indiana, is a beautiful lake, named,—if we mistake not—Sylvan Lake. This is a place, like Maxinkuckee Lake in our own county, of great summer resort. The most important place we passed in Michigan, was Kalamazoo, a flourishing town pleasantly situated on the left, or west bank, of a river of the same name, in the midst of a beautiful and fertile country. As we learn this village was first settled in 1829, and organized in 1831. It was known as Bronson, from the name of the first settler, till 1836.

On the evening of Thursday we arrived at Watson in Allegan Co., Mich. This county, on the west, borders on Lake Michigan, and is thus situated in the celebrated "Fruit Belt" that extends along the whole Eastern Shore of the Lake. Peaches of the best quality, and in the greatest abundance, are annually produced in this highly favored district of country. Apples of standard excellency seem also to abound there this year also. At this meeting we were agreeably surprised to meet Bro. Samuel Wilson, of Rahway, New Jersey, and Bro. G. W. Young, of Brooklyn, N. Y. With these brethren we formed a pleasing acquaintance on our visit East five years ago in the month of May and June. Both these brethren hold important positions in the Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge with headquarters at Brooklyn, N. Y. Their visit was most welcome and timely, as each one delivered some excellent discourses at different times during the continuance of the Conference. Bro. Woodward could only be induced to deliver one single discourse. The writer spoke, in his way, four times. One marked and good feature of both the Conferences that we have attended at Watson in 1885 and 1887, has been the willingness of all to take an active part in the social meetings. To isolated brethren and sisters these opportunities for social intercourse in prayer, praise, and exhortation were like oases in the deserts—like living springs in the hot sandy wastes.

Notwithstanding the unfavorable rainy weather the attendance was good indeed as regards numbers. From remote points in Michigan brethren and sisters convened on this occasion, united in acts of worship and devotion, and departed to their several homes to work for God, and to await the return of his Son from heaven. We understood that three persons were to be baptized on Monday morning by Eld. Houser; but the early arrival of the train at Martin compelled us to leave without witnessing the performance of this beautifully significant ordinance—solemn emblematic representation of the death, burial, and resurrection of our Redeemer, God's dear Son, and solemn picture prophecy of our own burial and uprising from the grave. How accurately and expressively the ordinances of the Gospel illustrate its cardinal doctrines. From baptism, in the burying waters, we emerge to walk "in newness of life" in this world—from the grave, in the covering earth, we emerge to enter into the eternal life of the world-to-come. Of this eternal life Christ Jesus is the source, and this endless life is hid with the dear Christ in God; and it will never be manifested in us till we shall awake in his likeness, then to appear with him in glory.

Bro. Young was in company with us as far as Fort Wayne on our return. We requested him to give our readers a sort of pen picture of his tour west and back. The first paper of his interesting narrative is given in this No. of THE RESTITUTION. Bro. Samuel Wilson had to leave Saturday, as his business demanded his personal attention on the following Monday in New York. We trust Bro. Young will be quite full and specific in his account of his western tour, and especially of the meetings he and Bro. Wilson attended. Since our visit there in 1885 some have fallen asleep; of whom Bro. Perkins, of Galesburg, was one. His warm exhortations impressed themselves deeply on our memory. While Sr. Perkins is left to "weep the widow's woes," she sorrows not in hopeless grief. With him she was at Watson in 1885—without him she was at Watson in 1887—with him again we trust she will soon be at the resolution of our Lord Jesus Christ, in resurrection life and glory.

For worried head and saddened heart how soothing—nay, more, how exhilarating—is communion with saints; with saints in whose heart is the Spirit of Christ.

"That joy in the heart we'll be longing to tell
When the beautiful spirit comes there to dwell."

Well, beyond the sunshine and the shadow, beyond the smiling and the weeping, beyond the heart-thrill and the heart-throe, beyond the laughing and the mocking, beyond the blooming and the fading, beyond the birth-cry and the death-gasp, we shall all be soon.

"How sweet it will be in that beautiful land,
So free from all sorrow and pain,
With a song on our lips and a harp in our hand,
To greet one another again."

Dear brethren and sisters, Jesus is coming—coming back to this earth again—and he "holdeth our crowns in his hands." We have met and we have parted—perhaps to meet no more on earth. Shall we meet in the Paradise of God? We commend you all to God and the word of his grace; which is able to build you up, and give you a lot and portion among the sanctified. Farewell. May we meet in the kingdom.

ROMANISM IN MEXICO.

"I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; until the Ancient of Days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom." Dan. vii. 21, 22.

The following, taken from the last number of the Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times, shows us what Papal Romanism is, in its true nature, in a country where it can act that nature out in overt deeds. Unmasked, it is today what it was in the days of the horrible Inquisition. Like sin its nature is unchangeable; and notwithstanding we may differ with some of our respected brethren in this matter, we are persuaded that the telescope of prophecy reveals, as sin's embodiment, or as the man of sin, the dynastic monster that wore the triple tiara and occupied the vacated throne of the Cæsars for 1260 years, till ousted from that seat of power by Victor Emanuel in 1870. In saying this we are only expressing our own personal views, and this with all deference toward others for whom we have warm esteem notwithstanding these differences in prophetic interpretation. Although cast out from the temporal throne it remains one of the worst powers for evil, and this power it will employ, to a certain extent, till the kingdom of God shall supersede all wicked earthly governments. "Thy kingdom come," though as yet an unanswered prayer, is a petition that will soon meet its response.

"Rome shall perish! write that word
In the blood that she hath spilt:
Perish by herself abhorred,
Deep in ruin as in guilt!"

The abominable system is doomed. Read the "hand-writing" upon the wall, in Rev. xviii.

THREE MEXICAN MARTYRS.

The sad news of the martyrdom in Mexico of three native teachers is sent by the Rev. Hubert W. Brown. The particulars had not reached him when his letter was sent, but he had received a dispatch which said briefly: "In Ahuacualtitlan, August 7, were assassinated Abraham Gomez, Cipriano Gomez and Felipe Zaragoza; wounded Felix Gomez. This calamity is a source of grief to the Liberal Governor, General Arce, who would gladly have saved the men if he had been able. The intolerance of the Roman Catholics, however, is beyond the power of the government to control. His advice to missionaries is: 'Leave this neighborhood for awhile; I cannot protect you just at present.'" One of the martyrs, Abraham Gomez, appears to have been a very bright young fellow, a good musician, who always led the singing to college and an earnest student. "He was licensed," says Mr. Brown, on leaving the seminary, and then two years later, at the last meeting of the presbytery, was ordained and sent to Guerrero. He went bravely and cheerfully to that dangerous field. His last letter was full of hope. Then came the terrible news of his violent death. I read the sad news to the young men in the seminary, and it made on some an impression I had not anticipated. They wrote Mr. Thomson and myself a short notice, stating that any one of those who signed it was willing to go to Guerrero and carry on the work in fanatical Ahuacualtitlan." Thus in Mexico and in our own day men are ready, as in the early Christian church, to face death for Christ's sake.

A Pleasant Trip and Visit.

After having had a very delightful feast of reason, and flow of soul during the convention at Brooklyn, N. Y. where our "Ass'n. for Prom. of Christian Knowledge" was held, my wife and I were kindly invited to visit our Bro. Samuel Wilson and wife at their home in Rahway, N. J. While there, and contrary to all expectation before coming, I concluded to accompany Bro. W. to Watson, Mich., to attend conference to be held there; the consideration on my part being in accord with Bro. Wilson's desire we started together Saturday Sept. 24, and after a delightful ride through the rugged scenery of the D. L. & W. R. R. whose course runs through a much wooded and hilly country, whose hills and valleys at this time of year are clothed in the beautiful dress of the changing leaf. I have travelled many thousands of miles by land and by sea, but never saw so much of beauty in Nature's transformation. True, this was a change from life to death; nevertheless there was in it lessons suggestive, and while death and decay seem written on all we come in contact with, yet to those who only look upon the present as the vestibule to the great and unseen future, there are "Sermons in brooks, etc." The varied hues of the scared and sometimes yellow leaf, reveal to us lessons only to be learned, as we aim to know God!

Our first stopping place was Scranton, Pa. There we were met by Bro. T. Finn who conveyed us to his hospitable home, and here we found freedom to compare notes on many things; and while, as it ever has been, so will it ever be, we may not all see, that is, understand alike, how refreshing it is when in the spirit of inquiry, we can, as brethren, sit down, and not see how far we can get apart from each other, but how near we can come to a knowledge of God's Word, and the obedience thereto required of us.

Here, at Scranton, there is quite a goodly company whose hope is in the Lord Christ, not only as the "Life Giver" but as the future "King over all the earth," regular meetings are kept up, and the preached word is always acceptable, but "cranks," and those whose lives are crooked, will find less welcome here than some might expect; and so it should be everywhere! This remark suggests to me a thought, and I offer it for the good of all, not only to those who preach, but to those who are preached to.

There are those today, as also in Apostolic times, who have no claim to a cordial reception, they come sometimes uninvited and unknown, and for pretence make long prayers, and think because they can say "Shibboleth" therefore have they right to friendship and fellowship. It seems to me, none should object who go forth as "preachers," yea, if not as such, to always carry with them an endorsement, and that too of recent date, from those with whom they have church relations; this would secure to all such a welcome, and save many feelings of regret by those who receive:—If letters of commendation were proper, are they today less so?

To return however. On Sunday, (and I am not afraid to use the word 'Sunday,' even if the keeping of this day is denounced as the "Mark of the beast" as some foolishly affirm) we met for worship in a very pleasant and commodius building erected by the brethren—and paid for—here Bro. S. Wilson preached the gospel of Love, not as an abstraction, but as that which has a fulness of significance! Oh that all who claim to be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, would strive after this, which is greater than "all faith," even to "the removing of mountains"—"Love abideth for ever." Sunday night Bro. Wilson again preached on the all-important theme—Resurrection: Yes; this is so important, that if there be no resurrection of Christ then those who have believed they were falling asleep in Christ have perished! Yes, the whole fabric of Christianity is one stupendous cheat and failure. We were not unmindful of the privilege of gathering around the table of the Lord, and in memory of his dying love show forth his death as a past act, to be perpetuated till he come again.

Monday night found us again assembled for preaching, when I was invited to speak; the subject being the great importance of our speaking forth words of truth and soberness, and saying none other things than that which is written, not in "Bodies of Divinity" nor in accord with "creeds" or "confessions of faith," but according to the oracles of God—outside of which give attention to no man, though he speak as an angel from heaven! Yea, bid him not Godspeed! and at the same time be careful as to what judgment ye judge; be not rash in the judgment, but prove all things.

Right here I am reminded of the educational character of genuine Christianity. Paul has said, and the same has been said in other forms of teaching—"When I was a child I thought as a child, when I became a man, I put away childish things." So it is with all who desire to know, and be properly instructed in the things which make for peace.

Education is a process, and the wisest of earth have had to confess they were only venturing on the threshold. This being true, is it not equally true, that as new born babes need and desire the sincere milk by which they grow, so we should desire that life in, parting spirit, without which we are none of Christ's, that we should grow up into full stature, even the measure of Christ, not of man!

After meeting, we parted company with those who we hope to meet in the brighter and better land, which, let us hope is not far off! There, in that beyond, the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick! Monday found us well on our journey, stopping for an hour or two to view the Falls of Niagara, a scene beyond the possibility of description by words, and even Churchs' masterpiece of painting only faintly presents the real. The day was beautiful, and the scenery grand. One thought came to me while viewing this grand overflow. Is it so, that the mind of the religious world is so lacking in appreciation of the sublimely beautiful in nature, even as it is, that they have to picture a heaven of departed souls winging themselves over in the presence of a Being whom they profess to believe is overspread throughout his universe having neither "body, parts or passions." Incompetent as I am to determine the exact configuration of God, I must have a personal being before me, or I could not truly draw near to him, or in anywise come into his presence! No! I shall see him; and in every deed God shall dwell with men:—call this materialism if you will! I must believe that he is, as well as that he is the rewarder of those who diligently seek him. God in nature, and nature in God, may be good Pantheism—thus getting away from personal responsibility to a personal Creator!

I parted from Niagara, as I had on former occasions, with regret, and here I part with my subject "A pleasant trip and visit" to renew at a future time.

GEO. W. YOUNG.

[Hope Bro. Young will continue his interesting narrative at his earliest convenience.—ED.]

Dear Restitution:

Though I am an old subscribor and an interested reader, and advocate the doctrines set forth in its columns, yet I have not seen a RESTITUTION for some time. Having been brought down to my bed with a severe fever in the early part of the season, and not recovering my strength in my convalescence, upon the advice of my physician, the latter part of July I took leave of my home (Dunnigan, Yolo Co., Cal.) relatives and friends, to travel along the coast southward, believing that the cool, bracing, and invigorating breeze from the water of the Pacific, might restore my shattered nerves.

Since then I have traveled over an extensive country, followed the windings of many a beautiful vale and stream, and some plains bleak and desolate, have climbed some high mountains, have met with and parted from some dear friends, had presented to my observation a fine chance for the study of the works of nature and more so of human nature, and finally at Santa Monica, had the privilege of stopping on the beach and taking plunge baths in the breakers of the waters of the great and majestic Pacific. I am now stopping awhile at Norwalk, and so mild is the climate of Los Angeles County, and so rapid and great the vegetable growth, I am often reminded of the Paradise of God and the Garden of Eden. Then would not the earth be so bad a place after all when the curse shall be removed, paradise restored, the curse lifted, the kingdom of God and his anointed established in the earth.

Yes, when our Lord and Savior shall come back again from heaven to receive his people, the saints, by changing the living ones, and resurrecting the sleeping ones who shall be sleeping in Christ, when he by that act shall change our vile nature by giving unto his saints eternal life, immortality and incorruptibility, to die no more forever.

For, "Behold, the tabernacle of God" "shall be "with men" "and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." For the promise is that the Lord's anointed "shall sit upon the throne of his father David," that "he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." For "the government shall be upon his shoulder, and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the prince of Peace, and of the increase of his government and peace, there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it, with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever." Yes, and "the zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Then why be looking for a future home "beyond the bounds of space and time."

As I reflect on these things I feel that I must try and do more than I have done for a few years past, and would like to make the acquaintance of as many of the brethren as possible who reside in the State. We are in the minority of other religious bodies, but with the hope we have, we should never be discouraged. And may God grant us "according to the riches of his glory, that we may be strengthened with might by his spirit, in the inner man." Your brother in hope of eternal life. S. S. GIBBS.

Dear Restitution:

We are greatly pleased with the Bible Lessons prepared by the Committee appointed by the Indiana Conference. It is exactly what we want and need, there is just enough of it and it is perfectly adapted to the needs of children from twelve and thirteen upwards to adults.

It seems to me, that a better plan of Bible study cannot be conceived. I do not see that our committee need any suggestions. These lessons will be valuable for adult Bible classes all over the country and especially in new localities.

In connection with this noble work we hope to have ere long a very valuable catechism for young children from the pen of Sister Carrie Williams. Every one who has ever read any thing from her pen will know that the work will be ably prepared.

We as a people have too long neglected this work and depended upon aids from sectarian sources. Let us all take hold and encourage in every possible way this noble effort. Your sister in hope. MRS. H. V. REED.

TEMPERANCE.

WHO'LL BUY?

[Suggested on seeing the advertisement of a wholesale liquor dealer.]

Forty casks of liquid woe—
Who'll buy?
Murder by the gallon. Oh!
Who'll buy?
Larceny and theft made thin,
Beggary and death thrown in,
Packages of liquid sin—
Who'll buy?

Foreign casks imported pure—
Who'll buy?
Warranted, not slow, but sure—
Who'll buy?
Empty pockets by the cask,
Tangled brains by pint or flask,
Vice of any kind you ask—
Who'll buy?

Competition we defy—
Who'll buy?
Dye, to make the soul jet black;
Dye, to make the conscience black;
Making wife do our cooking task—
Who'll buy?

WHAT INTEMPERANCE DOES.

Intemperance cuts down youth in its vigor, manhood in its strength and age in its weakness.

It breaks the father's heart, bereaves the doting mother, extinguishes natural affections, erases conjugal love, blots out filial attachments, blights parental hope and brings down mourning age in sorrow to the grave.

It produces weakness, not strength; sickness, not health; death, not life.

It makes wives widows, children orphans, fathers fiends, and all of them paupers and beggars.

It feeds rheumatism, nurses gout, welcomes epidemic, invites cholera, imports pestilence and embraces consumption.

It covers the land with idleness, misery and crime.

It fills your gaols, supplies your almshouses and demands your asylums.

It engenders controversies, fosters quarrels and cherishes riots.

It crowds your penitentiaries and furnishes victims for your scaffolds.

It is the life blood of the gambler, the element of the burglar, the prop of the highwayman and the support of the midnight incendiary.

It countenances the liar, respects the thief, and esteems the blasphemer.

It violates obligations, reverences fraud and honors infamy.

It defames benevolence, hates love, scorns virtue and slanders innocence.

It incites the father to butcher his helpless offspring, helps the husband to massacre his wife and the child to grind the parricidal axe.

It burns up men, consumes women, detests life, curses God and despises Heaven.

It suborns witnesses, nurses perjury, defiles the jury box, and stains the judicial ermine.

It degrades citizens, debauches the legislature, dishonors statesmen and disarms the patriot.

It brings shame, not honor; terror, not safety; despair, not hope; misery, not happiness; and with the malevolence of a fiend it calmly surveys its frightful desolation, and, nonplussed with its havoc, it poisons felicity, kills peace, ruins morals, blights confidence, slays reputation, and wipes out the national honor, then curses the world and laughs at its ruin.

For the Boys.

Let no boy think he is to be made a gentleman by the clothes he wears, the horses he rides, the stick he carries, the dog that trots after him, the house he lives in or the money he spends. Not one or all these things do it; and yet every boy may be a gentleman. He may wear an old hat, cheap clothes, live in a poor house, and spend but little money. But how? By being true, manly and honorable, by keeping himself neat and respectable; by being civil and courteous; by respecting himself and others; and finally, and above all, for fearing God and keeping his commandments.—Parish Visitor.

The great want of the church is an indwelling, living Christ. This would make all Bible truth acceptable when presented in its proper order and place. To a soul overflowing with love for the Master and good will to all his children, no Bible subject will be treated in an unchristian manner. Remember this, brethren, and seek by love to draw—melt people into the truth as it is in Jesus. Heat is genial. Cold is repellant. One who cannot be drawn, is not worth driving. Our harvest work is short, let us then concentrate our forces that our labor be not in vain in the Lord, and so we come at the sound of the "harvest home" bringing our sheaves with us. —*A. ## SEPTEMBER DAYS.

Ceasa plays his viol 'mid the grasses,
The last shrill sound at night, the first at morns;
Late poppies glow along the garden passes,
And light winds gently in the ripening corn.

The sluggish creek in meadows lately greening
Is flecked with gold and purple, either brink,
From dusty hedge the last wild rose is leaning
A deathly pallor on her lovely pink.

With Tyrian fruit the lowly poke is laden;
Wych-hazel weaves "her thread of golden bloom";
The wandering woodbine like a gypsy maiden
Warms with its color the deep forest's gloom.

The morning suns with pearls Arachne's weaving;
The orchard peach looks out with cheeks a-blush:
From shady nook the ring-dove's note of grieving
Floats far and faint upon the noontide hush.

By country roads the scarlet sumach's burning,
And over zigzag fences spread and shine
The lush dark elderberries, daily turning
Their loyal heart's blood into purple wine.

Down the lane-path, where cows come in the gloaming,
The thistles stand with faded armor on:
In buckwheat bloom the weary bees are roaming,
To gather sweets till the last day is done.

With all thy gift and grace, O fair September,
Some sad remembrance it is thine to bring
That fools the unwilling eyes but to remember
And choke with sighs the heart that fain would sing.

And yet when God has filled the earth with beauty,
And given the soul a quickened consciousness,
One may go forth in pleasant ways of duty,
And feel the chastening hand in close caress.

THE PAPACY AND THE MAN OF SIN NOT IDENTICAL.—No. 1.

While the spirit of antichrist, or the spirit of antagonism to the Christ, has been long in the world, and while there have been many antichrists, many individuals of prominence who have manifested opposition to the anointed one, we hold that the antichrist, the great antichrist of prophecy, or the man of sin, is yet future. We hold that his revelation, and that many of the judgments foretold in the Apocalypse, take place between the rapture of the church and the Lord's coming to the earth with his saints.

God revealed to Jesus Christ wonderful things which are to transpire at the consummation of this age and the beginning of the next, and these things Jesus Christ signified to his servant John by his angel. Concerning these it is affirmed that they are "things which must shortly come to pass." This word, shortly, is used in Rom. xvi. 20, in the same sense. "And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly." This refers to the time when he shall be cast down and bound for a thousand years, when Christ and his people shall have perfect authority. In God's reckoning of time, it does not mean what we should call a short period. Among these things one is the rising up of the beast, which is identical with the man of sin treated of by Paul, or the antichrist treated of by John, or the little horn portrayed by Daniel.

Three dispensation bring man to the end of the present system of things,—the patriarchal, the prophetical and the Christian dispensation. The Christian dispensation, or the dispensation of the Spirit in which we are now living, is the one which brings us to the end of the age, when that wicked one will have been revealed and have played his part.

Holy Scripture represents the last great antichrist as a person; he is represented as speaking and acting; and the pronouns he, his and him are used in describing his doings. Commenting on Paul's description of him in 2 Thes. ii. 3, 4, Olshausen says, "The individuality of antichrist can manifestly be excluded from this passage only by forcing its meaning." Another writer says, "If words have meaning, these words designate an individual." He is further represented as the head of the fourth great kingdom in its revived state; as the leader of the great armies that will come against Jerusalem, and that will make war with the Lamb. Every evidence is furnished that could be desired to show that the antichrist is not a system but an individual. Still while he is the leader of the great world power, the head of the fourth great kingdom, which is symbolized by the beast, this very term is sometimes applied to him individually, because he is the centre of power, and by his wonderful influence guides the affairs thereof. We know that the head of gold of the great image symbolized the first Gentile kingdom; yet all the power centering in Nebuchadnezzar its head, its great leader, the prophet said to him, "Thou art this head of gold."

The antichrist will be an incarnation of Satan; he will be energized and upheld by Satan; he is to have come up out of the abyss, doubtless, because Satan will possess him.

It is confidently asserted, however, by the majority of expositors that the Romish Church is the great antichrist of prophecy. And many believers in the premillennial advent affirm the same. Dr. J. A. Gordon, of Boston, Mass., avows his conviction that the papal "man of sin" was accurately photographed on the camera of prophecy thousands of years ago. He declares that "taking those photographs of Daniel, and John, and Paul, and searching the world upside down for their originals," he is confident that the Pontiff would be indicted to answer for certain souls beneath the altar who were slain. Now in dissenting from this view, so commonly held, let it not be thought for a moment that we have one word to say in extenuation of the persecuting spirit and bloody cruelties of the Popish Church. It is not easy for language, however strong, to exaggerate her apostacy, her duplicity, her bigotry, and her hatred of those who differ from her. No church has done more than the Church of Rome to corrupt Christianity. It has been guilty of the sin of adding to the word of God. It has multiplied traditions, professedly with a view to help the understanding of the word, but really to teach what is not in the word. It has treated the writers of the New Testament as if they were unable to make themselves understood by any but learned men; and so all through its existence its adherents have been kept, to a very great extent, in ignorance of the Scriptures, and taught to receive as divine truth the teachings of Popes and Councils; and in the days of her greatest temporal power, millions of persons suffered martyrdom for refusing to accept her teachings. But notwithstanding this, we do not believe that the Papacy answers the requirements of the antichrist, the little horn, or the man of sin, or the beast. Dr. Gordon, in calling the man of sin portrayed by Paul, the "papal man of sin," assumes the very point he should have proven.

Some of the particular predictions relating to the fourth kingdom, have never been met by the Romish Church. When has there been any Pope whose doings have answered to those which are to characterize the man of sin, the beast, the leader of the fourth great world-power? There never has been such a one. The defenders of this view know there never has been such a one. The most that they can do to make out their case is, to show some points of resemblance; but that is not the way God fulfils his word. When he fulfils a prophecy there will be a complete fulfilment.

The beast who makes war with the saints, is to prevail against them until the Ancient of Days comes; this is evidence that the Romish Church is not the beast, for the Romish Church has long since ceased to prevail against them.

The period of Rome's devastations and persecutions and cruelties, and the wicked doings of the little horn, or the beast, or the man of sin, are separated in time, and therefore they cannot be the same, and the papacy cannot be the antichrist. The terrible doings of the little horn described in Daniel viii. are to take place in the time of the end. Gabriel said to Daniel, "Behold I will make thee know what shall be in the latter time of the indignation: for it belongeth to the latter time of the end." Then after further speaking of the actions of the little horn, he repeats his assertion, "Shut thou up the vision, for it belongeth to many days to come." Verses 19, 26. How can writers, in the very face of the angel's declaration, declare that this has been fulfilled in the Papacy? They put it in the past; Gabriel puts it in the time of the end. George N. H. Peters, than whom no man living perhaps has gone more fully into the study of prophecy, says, "That class of interpreters who make the first beast of Rev. xiii. the antichrist, in its last head, are to be commended as correct, when thus made aside or separate from the Papacy." P. S. DEAR BRO.: Have been unwell, or this would have been sent off sooner. In discourse on "Union with the Son the Source of Spiritual Life," 8th and 7th line from bottom, first column, of last part, the words, "to cut off yourselves from sin, which is life indeed," should read, "to cut off yourselves from sin, which keeps you from laying hold on the life which is life indeed." I do not see how proof could have been read with copy.

Lines for the Lowly.

A tear-drop of the morning
Hung on a blade of grass,
A simple bead of water—
A thousand you might pass;
But when the flaming sunlight
Streamed down in morning pride,
Then you might see my water drop
Transfigured, glorified.

I looked—it shone a diamond,
Bright sparkling, clear and keen;
I looked again—an emerald
Hung pure in living green;
Again—it beamed out golden,
A topaz to the view;
Then flamed a ruby fiery red:
Then sapphire; Summer blue.

I saw thee how a water-drop
Is rife to all things fair;
Can give as bright and beauteous hues
As arching rainbows wear;
Can shine as bright and radiant,
And show as varied gem,
As the holy city fresh from God—
The new Jerusalem.

And I thought how many an action,
Of simplest, lowliest guise,
May yet, beneath the beam of heaven
Shine lovely to all eyes;
May show such beauteous motive
As angels shall applaud—
Truth, honor, virtue, goodness,
The love of man and God.

Two mites that make a farthing
Insured the widow's fame;
A single cup of water
Can buy a deathless name;
The humblest work for Jesus,
The gentle word or look,
The soothing sigh, the cheering smile,
Stand written in His book.

Fear not, then, lowly Christian,
Though deep in shade ye dwell;
The Lord will make thy faithfulness,
He will requite thee well;
The dew that wakes the dawning
Shall glitter in the rays
And bright shall shine thy jewell'd crown
When Christ shall bring the day.

The Alpine Rose.

The following beautiful story of an Alpine rose was written by a German girl only fifteen years of age:

April had just past with its snows and changeable weather, and the first warm sun of May was shining upon the earth; the snowdrops began to peep out of the ground, and by the soft ringing of their delicate white bells seemed to announce to the other flowers that it was time to appear and decorate the world by their sweet perfumes and brilliant colors. The birds that had been so long absent, commenced to sing and express their joy; —all was happiness and glee; the whole world seemed to have put on its festive garment in order to welcome the return of spring. Thus was all nature amongst the mountains of beautiful Switzerland! The astonished and almost dazzled eye of the spectator does not know where to fix his gaze, and what to admire most of all in this inspiring picture of extreme loveliness. There, on the top of the mountains, are magnificent glaciers in which are mirrored the brilliant rays of the sun, so that they appear to be strewn with rubies, emeralds and amethysts, while farther down there is a vast space which is covered with the most splendid white Alpine roses, intermingled with ferns and broad leaved ivy.

One would think it was impossible for any one to look at this beautiful landscape without pleasure and admiration, yet there was one person who could not feel thus on looking at these lovely flowers among which he was standing. It was a boy about fourteen years of age, dressed in the costume of the Swiss peasants. The morning wind had dishevelled his dark brown hair, and his eyes appeared swollen from weeping; he seemed to be in deep thought as he filled his little basket with roses, and he seemed greatly touched by a rosebud which looked so delicate as it peeped out of the green leaves by which it was surrounded. To a close observer it was evident that he knew not what he did. From time to time he cried out, "O, Lillie, my dear, dear, little sister; and no I must loose you,—also you—the last consolation left to me after my dear father's death: Oh, shall I never see your smile again; never will my labors be rewarded by your thankful looks; never shall your beloved lips say 'Charlie, my own dear brother.' These are the last flowers I can gather for you, and oh, they are to adorn your death bed!" And thus he went on with this outburst of grief as he slowly strolled down to the foot of the mountain, entered a little cottage, and went into the room where his poor dear sister lay. He knelt down by her side, and as he looked into the pale, but angel-like face before him, his sobs gradually ceased,—he became more calm, and his lips moved in prayer.

He then arose and taking the basket strewed the white roses over the silent death-bed, buried a beautiful wreath among her fair ringlets, and placed the half opened rosebud in her little folded hands; and she too, indeed, resembled that rose-bud, though pale, not less lovely, and as the rosebud had been plucked from its stem, she had been taken away from life before she had attained her full bloom. There were no signs of terrors of death to be seen in the quiet heavenly expression of that innocent face. The child seemed to sleep and to be dreaming of happy remembrances which caused a sweet smile to play upon her face. Two days had passed. It was the morning on which Lillie should be buried. For the last time Charlie came to cast a long sad look at the beloved one; he took from her hand the faded rose-bud, and pressing it to her cold lips, fervently exclaimed: "If I should ever be about to depart from the way of virtue I will look at this flower and it will remind me of you, darling sister, and preserve me from giving way to temptation; then I may hope to rejoin you in the heavenly country never more to be parted." One last fond kiss on the pale brow, and then he left her to the care of those who should carry her away to her dark cold grave. He could not accompany them, he had bade adieu and made the necessary arrangements with the clergyman of the village, and would now wander far, far away from his native village where nothing more was left for him to love or cherish.

Thus he went away—away from his own loved home, guarding the precious rose-bud carefully wrapped up in his little bundle as a last remembrance of his fond Lillie. He often looked upon it during his long and solitary journey, it softened his fatigues and consoled him in his loneliness.

At length he arrived at Paris, where he had often to suffer hunger and fatigue. Often he was about to despair, often having sought whole days in vain for employment, but he looked on his rose and he began his researches again with renewed strength.

It is needless to say how he passed his time in Paris; how often he was nearly fallen into the snares of the evil one, and how often his little rose-bud, —the souvenir of his sister, protected him from all harm. One day he was sent by a merchant to take a parcel to a rich man's house. He was waiting in the parlor for the return of the gentleman; he took the rose out perhaps for the thousandth time in his life and gazed upon it, not noticing that the gentleman stood watching him. All at once he approached, and laying his hand gently on the boy's shoulder, questioned him thus: "My boy, why do you always look at that faded flower? I have already seen you do so before, and marked how attentively you fixed your thoughts upon it, and I told Mr. G——to send you here in order that I might enquire its history. It is not from a mere curiosity that I have done so." "Oh, sir," replied Charlie, "It is a remembrance of my dead sister, and a safe-guard that shall always keep me from the broad paths of sin and vice and guide me into the narrow one of virtue." He then told the gentleman all we have already related, and in such a simple and touching manner that it brought tears into the eyes of his listener. "Will you stay with me my boy? I, too, have lost a treasure, my beloved and only son. I have wished for a boy whom I might have to cheer me in my old age. I will be a loving father to you; confide and trust in me." Charlie then flung himself into the outstretched arms of his new found friend that his rose-bud had procured him, and never again quitted him. He returned to see the graves of all his beloved ones, but then his native valley seemed so lonely to him that he soon left it. The rose-bud was now always kept in a golden case, and had the opportunity of testifying to some rich Jews about Christ. Then we went outside and spoke to one group after another, until we reached the Jewish quarter. Here, after earnest conversation with several, we were stopped, for the alarm had spread and Jews from all parts flocked together, some fanatical Talmudists stirring them up against us. "Brethren," cried one, "beware of these fishers of souls. They want to lead you to destruction. It is not lawful even to go near them; they are like lepers who ought to go about crying 'impoleon, unclean.'" Then there was a rush upon us, and a cry of "Let us stone them!" But, thanks be to God our Protector, we were not stoned.

Then we returned, but after dinner Jews began to flock to our rooms in parties of seven or eight, and though boisterous at first they gradually became most attentive and respectful listeners to the gospel. Several Talmudical students left their addresses to have Hebrew Testaments sent to them. If we appeared outside, a crowd would follow, some of whom kept crying, "Tell us, is Messiah come already?" "Is Jesus of Nazareth the Messiah?"

One Sabbath, seven wealthy, intelligent merchants from various parts of the Empire gathered in our room. Eagerly they put one question after another in a most earnest, inquiring spirit, asking if Moses and the prophets really spoke of Jesus, and wanting to see the passages with their own eyes. "It is all nonsense," says one; but he is soon put down by another who stands up, and, with many gesticulations, says, "It is no folly; it is truth, and I declare these men are right. They do not tell us to forsake God but to worship him in spirit and in truth, and not in mere forms and ceremonies. They say that Jesus Christ was the one sent from God, human and at the same time divine." Then handing us his card, he says, "Gentlemen, I live in Epirus; come there; I will welcome you; I will join you." "But do you mean to say that this is Christianity which we see around us?" asked the objector. "This cannot be a true religion." "Believe me," quaintly replies a third, "if Christ had known that Catholicism would be the outcome of his doctrines he would have wept. No, Catholicism is not true Christianity, but these gentlemen have told you they are not Catholics." And so the little meeting breaks up, but everyone leaves his card, begging for a New Testament to be sent to him! In a letter written from Buda-Pesth, Mr. Baron thus speaks of Rabbi Lichtenstein, whom he visited at Tagliassla:

He has taken upon himself the task, as he himself expressed it to us, "of making the name of Jesus Christ popular with the Jewish nation, and of lifting up the Gospel as the only source of spiritual renovation." He is an old man, with an honest, open face, a tender heart, and a soul which is sincerity itself. It was by no human teaching that he was brought to a knowledge of Christ. He could not tell, he said, how the New Testament found its way into his house, but the anti-Semitic movement which instigated the Tisza-Eslar trial, and the, to him, remarkable spectacle of Christian professors and pastors from various parts of the world writing in defence of the Jews, made him study it, and the more he read the more the beauty of the character of Jesus opened before him, until, "driven against himself by the Spirit of God," he felt obliged to publish "My Testimony," the first of three pamphlets, setting forth Jesus as the Messiah.

Living in an out-of-the-way place, he is unconscious of the sensation his pamphlets, which are being circulated by thousands, have created. He only knows that his testimony has set many wolves ready to devour him, but he has counted the cost and risked all for his convictions, and now, though severe is the test and heavy the trial through which he is passing, so that his aged head is bowed with grief, he stands firm. He was summoned before a synod of all the great Rabbis in Buda-Pesth, but to the universal clamor for recantation he was indifferent. All sorts of falsehoods are being circulated concerning him. Some say that he is mad, others that he has received a large sum of money from missionaries to write as he has done. Now they demand that he should resign his post as Rabbi, which is his only means of subsistence. He has presided over this community for thirty-five years. "Last week," said he to the writer, "three Rabbis came here, and after trying to stir up my people against me, they came to my house and argued with me for a long time, trying to persuade me to renounce my new position. They were at first clamorous and noisy, but before leaving the most zealous of the three asked me for a Hebrew Testament, as he would like to examine it for himself. I had just one to give him." Rev. Andrew Moody, of the Scotch Free Church in Buda-Pesth, has largely helped to scatter his pamphlets, and the Rabbi has also received a very friendly letter from Professor Delitzsch. Not long ago his daughter was married, an expensive event among the Jews. The Rabbi, whose income is small, being short of funds, a Jewish friend pressed on him the loan of 250 florins, saying it did not matter when it was returned. But now that he has taken up his position, this Jew, out of spite, has called upon him, in the public papers, to pay, without any previous notice. The same morning a Roman Catholic priest, whom he had never seen before, called at his house with 250 florins, begged him to accept of them, which the old man gratefully did, but at the same time frankly told him that he must not consider him as in sympathy with the Roman system of Christianity. He has since repaid part of this sum. This shows how Jews will act to those of their brethren who dare lift up their voice in favor of Jesus.—The London Christian.

JEWISH AWAKENING.

Rev. J. Wilkinson, at the Mildmay Mission to the Jews, writes:—"Another important movement amongst the Jews has broken out near Buda-Pesth. The most remarkable feature of it is that Rabbi Lichtenstein, who has been brought to Christ by the reading of the New Testament alone, is still the officiating Rabbi, while urging his congregation to accept Jesus as Messiah and Savior.

"A day or two ago I heard of another Rabbi having confessed Christ in Galilcia. It is evident the Lord is about to do wonderful things amongst his ancient people. Rabinowitz and Lichtenstein have both been brought to Christ by the New Testament, applied by the Holy Spirit. What an encouragement to distribute widely that precious Book in Hebrew!

"Further, several of us have been praying for some years, and are still praying, that the Lord would give such a mighty movement of the Holy Spirit amongst the Jews throughout the world as the church has never witnessed since Apostolic times. He seems to be giving the answer; we will begin to praise him, and continue in prayer, in which we affectionately ask all Christians to join us."

Mr. Wilkinson has also forwarded to us some most interesting letters which he has received from Mr. Baron, who, with Mr. Barnett, is evangelizing amongst the Jews in Austria, Hungary, Bohemia, and Galilcia. We append some extracts from the letters:

VIENNA.

We commenced mission work after much prayer and counsel with several of the Lord's servants here. There is no need to seek for a Jewish quarter, for every street nearly swarms with Jews, who number over 75,000. But oh, for the freedom of England! The law forbids us to give them a Bible or New Testament to guide them to Jesus Christ and heaven. We made a strong effort to obtain permission, but with no success.

By the Salzgries, the lower part of which used to be the Jewish quarter, the Gallician Jews especially congregate. There we reasoned and conversed with group after group for a long time. We asked one old man what his hope for eternity was, and he opened his coat to show that he wore fringes, Num. xv. 38. We urged him to trust in the Messiah, and he thankfully accepted a Testament, which he promised to read.

Another Gallician, whom Mr. Schonberger sent to us, exclaimed, as I spoke of the New Testament: "Oh, what a glorious book this is! The teaching in it is so noble and grand; no one ever spoke like Jesus. Why should our people in their ignorance reject such a treasure? I am a teacher, and because I teach the sayings of Jesus I have over so many pupils." A Jewish medical student was in the room, and he also is not far from the kingdom of heaven.

PRESSBURG.

This picturesque old town on the Danube, which used to be the capital of Hungary, has a population of 50,000, of whom more than a fourth are Jews. There is a Rabbinical school of great fame, at which Jews of all ages, but mostly old men, from various parts of Hungary and Galitsia, gather to study the Talmud. At breakfast we had the opportunity of testifying to some rich Jews about Christ. Then we went outside and spoke to one group after another, until we reached the Jewish quarter. Here, after earnest conversation with several, we were stopped, for the alarm had spread and Jews from all parts flocked together, some fanatical Talmudists stirring them up against us. And so the little meeting breaks up, but everyone leaves his card, begging for a New Testament to be sent to him! In a letter written from Buda-Pesth, Mr. Baron thus speaks of Rabbi Lichtenstein, whom he visited at Tagliassla:

He has taken upon himself the task, as he himself expressed it to us, "of making the name of Jesus Christ popular with the Jewish nation, and of lifting up the Gospel as the only source of spiritual renovation." He is an old man, with an honest, open face, a tender heart, and a soul which is sincerity itself. It was by no human teaching that he was brought to a knowledge of Christ. He could not tell, he said, how the New Testament found its way into his house, but the anti-Semitic movement which instigated the Tisza-Eslar trial, and the, to him, remarkable spectacle of Christian professors and pastors from various parts of the world writing in defence of the Jews, made him study it, and the more he read the more the beauty of the character of Jesus opened before him, until, "driven against himself by the Spirit of God," he felt obliged to publish "My Testimony," the first of three pamphlets, setting forth Jesus as the Messiah.

Living in an out-of-the-way place, he is unconscious of the sensation his pamphlets, which are being circulated by thousands, have created. He only knows that his testimony has set many wolves ready to devour him, but he has counted the cost and risked all for his convictions, and now, though severe is the test and heavy the trial through which he is passing, so that his aged head is bowed with grief, he stands firm. He was summoned before a synod of all the great Rabbis in Buda-Pesth, but to the universal clamor for recantation he was indifferent. All sorts of falsehoods are being circulated concerning him. Some say that he is mad, others that he has received a large sum of money from missionaries to write as he has done. Now they demand that he should resign his post as Rabbi, which is his only means of subsistence. He has presided over this community for thirty-five years. "Last week," said he to the writer, "three Rabbis came here, and after trying to stir up my people against me, they came to my house and argued with me for a long time, trying to persuade me to renounce my new position. They were at first clamorous and noisy, but before leaving the most zealous of the three asked me for a Hebrew Testament, as he would like to examine it for himself. I had just one to give him." Rev. Andrew Moody, of the Scotch Free Church in Buda-Pesth, has largely helped to scatter his pamphlets, and the Rabbi has also received a very friendly letter from Professor Delitzsch. Not long ago his daughter was married, an expensive event among the Jews. The Rabbi, whose income is small, being short of funds, a Jewish friend pressed on him the loan of 250 florins, saying it did not matter when it was returned. But now that he has taken up his position, this Jew, out of spite, has called upon him, in the public papers, to pay, without any previous notice. The same morning a Roman Catholic priest, whom he had never seen before, called at his house with 250 florins, begged him to accept of them, which the old man gratefully did, but at the same time frankly told him that he must not consider him as in sympathy with the Roman system of Christianity. He has since repaid part of this sum. This shows how Jews will act to those of their brethren who dare lift up their voice in favor of Jesus.—The London Christian.

Sweet Lips.

"Ah! lonely seats like those we've known,
Where lips, one sweet endeavor,
All crowned with beauty and with bloom,
The hand of death did sever,—
Their memory, like the summer's day,
Will linger round us ever."

In "Annals of a Quiet Neighborhood" there is this gem: "So, for my part, I said to myself as I walked home, 'If I can put one touch of rosy sunset into the life of any man or woman of care, I shall feel that I have walked with God.'"

Walking with God! What a strengthening, comforting, beautiful thought! God by our side, helping us, guiding us, leading us safely, whether the way be smooth or rough. We cannot, perhaps, be like the mountains, grand, stately, magnificent, seen from afar and admired by the multitude; but we can be like the grassy dell, beautiful with sunshine and refreshment, fragrant with sweet flowers, and jubilant with the songs of birds. The helpfulness in the family circle, if given in a gentle, unobtrusive way, is a training which rapidly uplifts lives. Those are sweet lives which seek to remove obstructing thorns from another's rough path; and there is never a thorn thus removed from the path of another, without a rose being scattered on one's own. Mild forbearance in regard to other people's faults is a necessity to every sweet life—the suppression of unkind words another necessity.

The sunshine of such lives brightens darkened homes, warms chilled hearts, and illuminates grouping souls. Indeed, the power of such lives is wonderful. They point out the right path to the wayward feet, and beckon homeward the lost. They hold cups of water to parched lips, and offer the bread of life to human souls. They scatter good seed with generous and never-tiring hand. What a harvest of golden sheaves will be theirs!—Christian at Work.

JOY COMETH.

"Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

Out of the weary shades of night,
Out of the darkness cometh light;
Into fearful doubt or midnight storm,
Courage and hope of faith are born.

From mountain height the tempest flings
Earth's hope beneath death's angel wings,
But lo! there shines the "morning star,"
Gleaming in glory from afar.

Beyond the storm king's mocking shroud,
God's signet-ring upon the cloud;
Pledges his love and truth and light,
When Faith herself is lost in sight.

THE SALOON IN POLITICS. No. 2.

Not less than 80,000 victims go annually to the drunkard's grave. Pestilence and war combined do not, in this country, equal its destructive energy. I repeat what I have had occasion to say elsewhere, that the waste of human life wrought every five years by our 200,000 saloons, is equal to the destruction of life by both armies, numbering millions of armed men, during the entire War of the Rebellion. In their hands strong drink is a weapon so fatal that the 300,000 drunkard-makers are able to accomplish more in the same period than four times their number could with shot and shell, fire and sword, and all the appliances of modern warfare. The cruelty of war is not measured by the number of those who fall in battle, but by the unutterable woe and bitter anguish of broken hearts and desolated homes. Most emphatically is it true, that the mere destruction of 80,000 lives every year affords no measure of the relentless cruelty of the liquor power, in its war against society. To realize this you must go to the dishonored homes, question the broken hearts, read the voiceless misery in wan and haggard faces, hear helpless children cry for food, see them stricken down by drunken and infuriated fathers, and sometimes even by besotted mothers, witness the decay and ruin of youth, and the utter degradation, ignorance, poverty and misery which everywhere and always accompany the victims of the saloon. Do you say that all these are the incidents of the business, not the motives for it? Certainly. Let us do these men no injustice. Human misery is not their motive. They only want to get money, and knowing that these things follow as effect follows cause, they are not deterred. Doubtless they would prefer to get money without these disagreeable consequences of their acts. A like plea may be made for the burglar and highwayman. Their motive also is money, not murder.

In addition to its waste of property and productive power, and its relentless cruelty, the saloon is a most dangerous enemy to the Republic.

The home and the ballot are the very corner-stones on which our free institutions rest; the very holy of holies behind the sacred altars of Freedom. Destroy the one, or corrupt the other, and free government is a failure. The liquor saloon aims its deadly blows at both. If the hopes of our fathers, and our own ambition for this great Republic are to be realized, we must protect and cherish the myriads of homes, where children are daily taught those lessons of Christianity, liberty, justice and forbearance, which alone will qualify them for the sacred trust of citizenship. Whatever else the liquor saloons have done, they have never made one happy Christian home, and they never will. On the other hand, they have created unnumbered thousands of places, miserable homes, where the seeds of disorder and anarchy are daily planted and nourished in the minds and hearts of the young. These desecrated homes are the primary schools, in which are taught by precept and example, the first lessons in disorder and crime, while the saloons themselves are the colleges from which the most dangerous order of criminals are graduated. They stand open night and day—Sundays included—ready to receive the myriads of poor, ignorant and misguided wretches, whose childhood blighted in the drunkard's home makes them the ready victims to the teachers of disorder, socialism, and anarchy, who here find their council-chamber and their inspiration. I verily believe that if the saloon were abolished, the dangerous classes which now menace society would to a great extent disappear with it. What think you would become of the anarchist and socialist without his ally and assistant? Where would he rally his forces? Where would he teach his treason? Where would he find inspiration for his followers? The saloon system is itself a league of law-breakers, whose example affords a most powerful stimulus to disorder of all kinds. It openly proclaims its purpose to disobey all laws which interfere with its supreme purpose to make money in its own way, and at whatever sacrifice.

The corrupt use of money is, in my judgment, one of the most dangerous evils which now threatens the future of this Republic. It is the blighting, festering source of many of the other evils of which we complain. It is sapping the very foundations of public confidence and respect for law, by polluting the sources of political power. It stalks with brazen face into our legislative halls, and with scarcely a pretense of concealment dictates our laws. It too often corrupts the press, and changes truth into a lie. It is the ready and well-known instrument by which the will of the people is thwarted in a thousand ways. It is the efficient means by which individual wealth and corporate power aggrandize themselves at the expense of the people, and by which giant evils maintain their hold upon society. Let it be generally understood and acquiesced in, that elections depend not upon the free will of the people, but that their results are purchased with money, or whisky, and the end of free institutions is not far off. Upon the ruins of Judah is written "Idolatry," of Greece and Rome "Sensuality," of Spain "Avarice," and upon the ruins of the Great Republic will be written "Corruption," unless there be virtue enough in the people to rescue it from the bottomless abyss toward which its steps are tending. Combine and aggregate all the other corrupting agencies and influences of our times, and they are dwarfed beside the Liquor Power. Indeed, but few of the other methods of corruption are complete without it. I know of no other agency which openly proclaims its right and its purpose to control elections, and to prevent the passage of distasteful laws, by the use of money.

BY WHAT RIGHT DOES THE SALOON EXIST?

I know of none. Slavery had some excuse for existence, because, wicked as it was, it had a place in the Constitution. The saloon system can plead no constitutional guaranty. Even the absurd and oft-repeated claim of "personal liberty," put forth by the liquor drinker, does not apply to the seller. If we admit the right to commit suicide, it does not prove the right to commit murder. If I have the right to destroy my usefulness and my life, by strong drink or poisonous drugs, it does not follow that you have the right to sell them to me, knowing the use I will make of them.

Nor can the saloon system base its right to exist on any claim of usefulness. It is not a legitimate branch of trade, supplying a natural and healthful demand, but, as we have already seen, an active, tireless agency in the creation of an unnatural demand for that which is only pernicious in its effects. If its dreary pathway of vice be illumined by one good deed done for country or for humanity, it has not yet been reported. If it has one redeeming virtue to offset against an unbroken monotony of wickedness, it has been most successfully concealed. Its character, purpose and history declare it to be a proper subject for political outlawry, without title to sympathy, or the right to be.

If society has the right of self-protection against unjust taxation it most assuredly may protect itself against the unequaled burden imposed by the liquor traffic. If the right exists to guard the community against crime, corruption or the spread of contagious disease, for a much stronger reason it exists against the saloon, which is the known cause of more crime, corruption, disease and death than any other agency.

The only honest ground on which the saloon system can claim the right to be, is the right of the individual to get money regardless of the consequences to society. And for the same reason that we punish criminals who put that principle into practice, we have the right to abolish the saloon.

The apparent indifference with which many good people seem to regard this evil is incomprehensible. How shall we account for it? A few weeks ago the whole civilized world was shocked, and justly so, by the burning of two hundred people in a theater in Paris. That very night, the fires of the saloon probably destroyed more than that number in the United States alone, and under circumstances far more shocking. The existence of a dozen cases of cholera in New York would alarm the whole country, and yet there are nine thousand saloons in that city, each of which is more dangerous than a dozen cases of cholera.

Is it not true that our long familiarity with the saloon and its work, has blinded us to its enormities? Suppose we had never seen or heard of it until it suddenly burst upon us in all its destructive wickedness. What indignation and horror would thrill every breast! The patriotic response to the first rebel gun at Sumter would seem cold in comparison with the popular uprising, which would overwhelm and utterly destroy the hideous and hateful thing.

Or suppose that while the nation slept, wearied with the care and toil of daily life, an enemy had crept in and planted his minions on every block, and on every street of our cities and villages, and we had suddenly awakened, on the Fourth of July morning, to find him destroying our people at the rate of 80,000 per annum, filling our jails and poor-houses with his victims, taxing us hundreds of millions for his own gain, debauching our young men and maidens, converting our homes into hells, breeding anarchy and violence, polluting our elections, and bribing our law-makers, in order to maintain his power. Would good men be indifferent? Would politicians court his favors? Would political parties form alliances with him for mutual protection and support? Precisely, such an enemy is in our midst. Shall he remain until he subverts all we hold sacred, or shall we, by a common patriotic impulse, renew our declaration of Independence, and banish the destroyer forever from our homes and our country?—Hon. William Windom.

JEWISH NOTES.

The Russian Church, which has been in the process of construction during the last ten years on the Mount of Olives, is now finished. A small convent or pilgrim-house has also been completed, new roads have been made, trees planted, and grounds laid out, by the same Russian ecclesiastics, who are exhibiting of late unusual activity in the acquirement and improvement of sites. Above all, on the highest point of the mount rises the square tower, which forms so novel a feature in the character of the Holy City; already carried to the height of three stories, another remains to be added from whose apex it is hoped that the Mediterranean Sea may be visible. As a campanile it lifts aloft a chime of a dozen bells, lifts them even now in place—bells the peculiar antipathy of Mohammedans.

In order more readily to bring in stones for the construction of a Mohammedan school on the site of the convent of Maria Maradolfo, or more commonly known by the name of Mumnish, on the northern border of the Muslim quarter of Jerusalem, the authorities of the city have allowed the closed door of Herod's Gate to be opened, known in Arabic as Bab es-Zahari, or the Gate of Flowers. It stands half-way between the Damascus Gate and the northeast corner of the city wall. Just opposite Jeremiah's Grotto the wall makes an inward bend in its course; and from this point the stones required for the new structure are broken from the living rock.

A short distance to the southeast of the Garden of Gethsemane, between the two roads leading southward, the Emperor of Russia and his brothers are building a small but costly and beautiful church as a memorial of their mother. Its walls are completed and ready for the roof. In style it is peculiarly and decidedly Muscovite, embracing seven towers, terminating in onion-shaped cupolas; and when finished the structure will form a strange and striking object in the scenery of the Kedron Valley.—From the Independent.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jny6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886, "Feb" February, "Mar" March "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January, "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

"The Gospel of God's Salvation and Kingdom doctrines—is fully set forth through Christ—Risen position of the dead—Second coming of Christ—The Kingdom of God, etc., will be faithfully preached every Sunday morning at 10:30 a. m., to which services we heartily invite the seeker after divine truth. This service will close at 11:30, after which is observed the "most forgiveness," "breaking of bread and prayers." 176 Grand st., second floor, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10 a. m. every Sunday (D. V.) in Blood and Keller's Block, Rooms 6, 7 and 8 Ontario Street, corner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Seats free. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are welcome.

THE COMING AGE,

—IN—

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new additions are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, push it unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of expectical interpretations, and presents forcible views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It unfolds the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is modifying and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, realm, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who governs all.

THE SEVENTH-DAY, No. 8.

[Copyrighted, 1887.]

THE SABBATH ON A ROUND WORLD.

I shall not attempt to give a methodical exhaustive argument on the Sabbath question. There are scores of able works of that kind already, easy of access to all if desired. I shall only take up some of the main pillars upon which Sabbatarians build their arguments. If these fall, the whole building must go with them.

But before I do this, let us consider the nature of the Sabbath commandment. That this precept is partly of a moral, and partly of a ceremonial nature, has generally been held by the best theologians. This position is well founded. It is a well proved fact that man's nature, physical, mental, social and spiritual, requires a day of rest and worship about as often as one day in seven. Probably this principle is applicable to all intelligent beings, whether men or angels or inhabitants of other worlds. So far the precept may be called moral. But when you come to the particular day or time for this rest, that must vary with circumstances, and may be one day as well as another, if God so direct.

All must admit that this commandment does differ from these which are admitted to be wholly moral. No one could all his lifetime live in open violation of the commandments against idolatry, blasphemy, murder, adultery, stealing, etc., and yet have the least claim to the blessing of God or the hope of heaven. Yet the most zealous Sabbatarian will readily admit that millions of devout Christians have lived holy lives, and will be saved, who never kept the seventh day, but rested Sunday instead. And the most devoted Sunday-keeper will as cheerfully admit that those who conscientiously keep Saturday instead of Sunday are Christian people, and will be saved. Now, certainly one or the other of these classes does not keep the [illegible] commandment, if the essential [illegible] to keep the particular day. [illegible] could any other commandment be thus broken by a person, and he still be a Christian or even a moral man? Would any seventh day man for a moment recognize as a Christian any person who would every week violate the letter of any other commandment? No, nor would he excuse him on any plea of ignorance either. Yet they will freely admit that thousands right around them who do not keep the Sabbath commandment as they read it, are yet good people and Christians. So, they themselves being judges, this commandment does differ from the others in some way.

Again, all the benefits of Sabbath-keeping are secured just as truly by keeping Sunday as Saturday. Physical rest, cessation of business, a quiet day, mental rest, social advantages, religious worship, the moral influences—everything that can be secured by keeping the Sabbath day, is secured by keeping the first day. So, if in the providence of God, any other day of the week had been selected, all these advantages of Sabbath-keeping would have been secured by one day as well as another. But could such a course be pursued with any other precept with as good results? Certainly not. Sabbatarians can afford to meditate on this point a little.

Furthermore, without a direct command of God to keep it, it would never have been wrong to work on the seventh day. In itself, and by its own nature, that day is no different from any other day. But would not idolatry, blasphemy, disobedience to parents, murder, etc, have been wrong and wicked, even though God had given no commandment against them? Surely they would. Why this difference? Because, in the very nature of things, these acts are wrong, while it is not so with regard to keeping a particular day. The sanctity of the day does not rest upon the nature of the day itself, but simply upon God's appointment.

In their very nature all purely moral laws are universal and eternal in their application, are binding in heaven, in Eden, on Jews or Gentiles, saints or sinners, now or hereafter. Test the particular seventh day, Saturday, by that rule, and it fails everywhere. Go to Venus, where the days are about twenty-three hours long; to Jupiter, where they are only about ten hours long; to Saturn, where they are only about twelve hours long, or to some of the larger planets, where their days are much longer than ours. How could the inhabitants of those worlds keep our seventh day? They could keep a seventh day, their own, but that would not be of the same length of ours, nor come at the same time of ours. Even seventh day Adventists now admit this. Thus the Review and Herald of July 19, 1887, says in answer to a request to "explain, how the inhabitants of the different planets belonging to our solar system can observe the Sabbath, as the length of the days on other planets varies from the length of the days on earth." "The time occupied by the revolution of a planet on its axis constitutes its day, and it matters not whether that time be longer or shorter. Seven of those days would constitute a week for each planet, respectively, and the seventh could be observed as the Sabbath as easily on other planets as on our own."

Exactly, but their seventh day would not be our Saturday, nor would the seventh day of any two planets be alike, nor come at the same time. All the universe can keep a seventh part of time, but not the same seventh part. Not knowing this, see what a blunder Mrs. White made. She says: "I saw that the Sabbath would never be done away, but the redeemed saints, and all the angelic host, will observe it in honor of the great Creator to all eternity." ("Spiritual gifts," vol. I. p. 113.) Elder U. Smith, ("Biblical institute," p. 146) says: "We infer that the higher orders of his intelligences keep the Sabbath also.....The Sabbath of each of his creatures will be the Sabbath of all the rest, so that all will observe the same period together for the same purpose."

Here you have your definite seventh day theory with a vengeance. Look at the utter absurdity and impossibility of the theory. All intelligent beings in heaven and earth, and on all the planets, keep the same period together." So the Sabbath day on this little planet of ours regulates the Sabbath days of all the planets in the universe! I wonder how they manage it in Jupiter, where their days are only ten hours long, or in Venus, where they are twenty-three hours long, or on some of the planets where they are as long as several of our days? As the Sabbath must be kept from sunset to sunset (Lev. xxiii. 32), I wonder how they find out, on all those planets, just when it is sunset down here!

But stubborn facts nearer home show that God's children do not, and can not, all "observe the same period together." Everybody knows that it is Saturday in India some twelve hours sooner than it is here, and that it is Saturday here twelve hours after it has ceased to be Saturday there. In Australia the day begins eighteen hours sooner than it does in California. So the seventh day brethren in California are working nearly the whole time that their brethren in Australia are keeping Sabbath! Come even nearer home than that. The sun sets about three hours later in California than it does in Maine. So when the seventh day Adventists in Maine begin to keep the Sabbath at sunset Friday evening, their own brethren in California, where the sun is yet three hours high, will still be at work for three hours! So, very few of them even on this earth, "observe the same period together." While some of them are keeping Sabbath on one part of the earth, others of them are at work on another part of the earth. How much less, then, do all the heavenly host keep the same period with men on earth.

Now, if, as Mrs. White and Bro. Smith say, the angels keep our Sabbath, the question is, with which party do they keep it? With those in Australia, or with those in America? If the angels keep the Sabbath at the same time the Sabbatarians keep it in Australia, then the Sabbatarians in America are working while the angels keep Sabbath, and so, of course, the angels work while those here rest. So we see how absolutely false and absurd is the theory that all can keep the Sabbath at the same time.

I have to confess that for many years I was so stupid as to suppose that the Lord himself kept the Sabbath at the same time I did here. I supposed that when the sun set Friday evening and I began keeping the Sabbath, the Lord and the angels began keeping it, too. But now I see how utterly impossible that is; for if the Lord keeps the Sabbath at the same time I do here, then he does not keep it with the brethren on the opposite side of the globe, because they begin the Sabbath at least twelve hours earlier than we do here. In fact, it takes just forty-eight hours, or the time of two whole days, from the time any one day first begins in the extreme east till it ends at the furthermost place in the west. Will the reader stop and think carefully, sharply, on this point, for it is an important one? It takes twenty-four hours for the first end of a day to go clear around the earth. Then, as the last end of the day is twenty-four hours behind the first end, it must also have twenty-four hours more to go clear around the earth, and that makes forty-eight hours in all that each day is on the earth somewhere.

I am quite certain that the average Sabbatarian feels when he keeps the seventh day that he is now keeping holy time with the Lord himself, and with the angels, and with all his brethren. I used to feel that way I know, and the above quotations from Mrs. White and Elder Smith show plainly that even they think so, too. But it will be seen that this cannot be so unless the Lord keeps the time of two whole days each week. And in that case, those on this side of the earth would be working while the Lord was keeping the Sabbath with those on the other side of the earth. Then those on the opposite side of the earth would be working while the Lord kept the Sabbath with those on the other side. And so none of them would keep the Sabbath with the Lord after all. In fact, taking it all around the earth, there is not a single hour in the whole week when there is not some Sabbatarian at work on some part of the earth!

But, further, does the Lord keep our seventh day with us, or does he keep the seventh day with the people on other planets? Our days and weeks are not at all in harmony with theirs, nor can one of them be like another. Now, if the Lord rests only on our Saturday, then he could not rest on the seventh day of Venus or Mars or Jupiter, etc., as the seventh day of each planet differs in length, and comes at a different time, from that of our earth or any other planet. How, then, could God rest on all these days? If he did, he must keep Sabbath all the time, and then nobody, angels or men, could keep the Sabbath with the Lord if they worked at all!

What, then, becomes of Mrs. White's statement that "all the angelic host" keep our Sabbath? or Elder Smith's hypothesis that all the universe "will observe the same period together?" Both are utterly absurd. The same definite seventh day can not be kept by all the universe; even on this earth alone it can not be kept by all at the same time; but all can keep a seventh part of the time. This principle upon which the fourth commandment was based, may be of universal application in earth and in heaven, in time or eternity. But just which day that will be, is a matter of minor consequence to be determined by the circumstances in the case, which may and must differ at different times and in different places. To the Jewish people it certainly was the seventh day, or Saturday, and no other day would have met the commandment. All the rigorous limitations and exactions of the Sabbath day, as under the Jewish law, could be carried out by a small people in a limited territory where the church here rule. A particular day, the seventh, Deut. v. 12, 15; definite hours, sunset to sunset, Lev. xxiii. 32; no fires in all their houses, Ex. xxv. 3; stoning to death for picking up a stick, Num. xv. 32-36, this was the Jewish law. But we are not Jews, nor under the Jewish law. Under the new dispensation of the gospel, other circumstances have arisen plainly and grandly marking another day as the all-important day in Christian memory—the resurrection day. When the gospel was to go to all nations, to all climates, and around the earth, the Christian rest day was necessarily and wisely left upon a far different basis.

Then, how do our Sabbatarian friends know just where, at what place on the earth, to begin reckoning the day? They certainly know nothing about it, but have to guess at the whole thing. Open your map at longitude 180 deg. west, where the day line is located by common consent by Sabbatarians and all. It runs across a point of Asia, and through the Pacific ocean. On the west side of this line, as the sun sets Friday evening, the seventh day is reckoned to begin. A few rods on the east of this line the same day does not begin till twenty-four hours later, as now reckoned.

But who knows that this is the exact place where the Lord began the day? No one, as there is no evidence of it whatever. It is all guess work. It was only by accident and for convenience that it was located here. At a comparatively recent date the English began to reckon longitude from the royal observatory at Greenwich, England. From this place 180 deg. east or west are reckoned, and there the day line was located by them, and finally accepted for convenience by other nations. But suppose that Jerusalem, Rome, Paris, or Washington, had been selected, instead of Greenwich; then what? In that case, which easily might have happened, and may even yet, the day line would have been thousands of miles from where it is now. Then for thousands of miles it would have been Saturday where now it is Sunday, and Sunday where now it is Saturday! If the day began in the traditional place where Eden is supposed to have been located, then it would have been away east of this some 7,000 miles, west even of Australia; and then the seventh day people in Australia are not keeping the Sabbath at all. In that case the Sunday keepers of New Zealand and Australia are now actually keeping the original seventh day, and Sabbatarians there are keeping the sixth day! Do they know, and can they prove, that this is not so? No; they simply have to take the reckoning just as it happened to be, right or wrong, without knowing which it is. And yet, at great expense, they have sent missionaries there to convert the people over to keep another day, when actually they do not know but what those people are really keeping the seventh day, and they themselves are wrong! None, not even themselves, pretend to know where God began to reckon that day; yet they draw the line on a hair, and say that all will be damned who do not toe that line and count from that spot! Does the salvation of a man's soul depend upon such mathematical nicetics and such uncertainties as these? If it does, we may well despair of heaven.

The very fact that God has never revealed just where the true day line is, or where the seventh day began, shows that it is of no consequence for us to know. As a matter of fact, the people of Alaska and of Pitcairn's Island, both lying on the American side of the day line, having come to those lands from the east, brought with them the reckoning of the east, and so call our Saturday Sunday.

Look also at the difficulty in crossing this supposed day line in the Pacific Ocean. I have personally conversed with Sabbatarians who have crossed this line both ways, east and west. Going west, a day is added, going east, it is dropped, and this is done at noon of the day which finds the vessel a man going west sits down to dinner at 11:59 a. m., Friday. While he is eating the time is changed and he rises from dinner Saturday noon! Then he has only six hours of Sabbath till sunset; on coming east, he sits down to dinner Saturday noon and rises from dinner Friday noon! He has kept eighteen hours Sabbath; then it is gone in a second at high noon, and he has six hours to work till sunset. Now he must begin Sabbath once more and keep it over again, twenty-four hours! In one case he only kept six hours Sabbath, and in the other case he kept forty-two hours!

These stubborn facts demonstrate the utter absurdity of the Sabbatarian view. They claim that these things do not bother them any; but I know that they do, and badly, too. They have written much on it, devised all sorts of diagrams, illustrations and arguments to meet the difficulty; but none are satisfactory, even to themselves. Hence new methods are constantly being devised to dodge the difficulty. The latest discovery is that adopted by the seventh day Adventist ministers of the New York conference. It is, that the earth is absolutely flat and stationary, with sun, moon and stars much smaller than the earth and revolving around it! "The sun, he do move," the old darkey said, and they say, Amen.

Now test the definite seventh day theory in the frozen regions of the north. The day must be kept from sunset to sunset (Lev. xxiii. 32.) But in the winter there are months when the sun is not seen there at all, so they have no sunset. And again, in summer there are months when the sun is above the horizon all the time, when there is no sunset. Here the theory breaks down entirely, and the day must be reckoned by artificial means. They can keep one-seventh of the time, and that is absolutely all that can be done. Seventh day Adventists have argued that there was no real difficulty here; it was all imaginary. But I happen to know that they themselves have got into serious trouble right there. They have churches so far north in Norway, that in winter the sun sets at 2 p. m. Nearly all the brethren work in mills. Of course they must lose Saturday any way. Then if they begin at sunset they can not work Friday afternoon. This breaks up the time so that they could not get work nor make a living. So it was decided to begin the day at 6 p. m., instead of sunset. In this way they would work four hours after the seventh day began. Mrs. White and her son, Elder W. C. White, were there, and favored the change. This, it will be seen, abandoned the whole definite day theory. In the fall of 1885 I was on a theological committee to investigate this case, and hence know how it was. What endless and needless difficulties people get themselves into by trying to keep a law which was only designed for the Jews in a limited locality. How contrary to the freedom and simplicity of the gospel!

In reply to all these facts, which can not be denied, seventh day people say, Is not the first day of the week, or Sunday, just as definite a day as the seventh day, or Saturday? Is it not just as difficult to keep Sunday all around the world as it is to keep Saturday? Do you not claim that you should keep the first day in honor of the resurrection? and will it do, then, to keep some other day? The answer to these questions is not hard to give. The essential idea is that we should devote one day in seven to religious duties. To secure the highest good, all should unite in observing the same day. From the days of the apostles the Christian church has, with one consent, observed the day on which Jesus rose from the dead, the first day of the week, or Sunday. But it is not claimed that it is absolutely essential that exactly the same minutes and hours, or even the same definite day, must be kept always and under all circumstances, whether or no. That would be legalism, and contrary to the very nature and freedom of the gospel. Suppose the Jewish day on which Jesus arose was reckoned from sunset to sunset, as doubtless it was, must we also reckon it that way? As it is found more convenient to reckon the day from midnight to midnight, and as all are united in doing so, it is for the best interests of religion to conform to this custom. If, in travelling around the world, men should mistake their longitude, as in the case of Alaska and Pitcairn's Island, and call Saturday Sunday, it is not material. They had better all unite on that, than to quarrel over it. If, in the long period of darkness at the north pole, men should lose the time, and then select some other period than that which exactly corresponds to our Sunday, hour for hour, the difference would not be material. Or, if in locating the day line from which to reckon the beginning of the day, that line had happened to be located 5,000 miles further east or 10,000 further west, it would not have made a particle of difference. And as to whether we now begin the day just where God did in Eden or not, is a matter of no consequence. And whether our brethren in China rest at the same time we do or not, is of little account. And whether the Sabbath of Jupitor and Mars and Neptune, and of heaven itself, comes when ours does or not, is of little interest to us. It will be time enough to settle that matter when we go to live with them. So while travelling around the earth, east or west, or crossing the day line, whether or not we are able to keep exactly the same time, or even exactly one seventh part of the time to a minute, is of little importance. We do the best we can under the circumstances, and conform to the time as reckoned by those where we go. To "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel," is not a good practice in any cause. But with the strict Sabbatarian all this is entirely different. A certain day, beginning at precisely such a line to a hair, and at such a minute to a second, is holy time. If you don't hit that exact time just right, you might as well keep no day at all! That may do for Judaism, but it certainly is not according to the spirit and freedom of the gospel.

I believe this is a fair statement of the position held by the great body of the intelligent observers of Sunday. It harmonizes exactly with the statement of our Savior, that "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath." Mark ii. 27. Man and his highest good are first; the Sabbath is secondary and subservient to these. Practically, the Sabbatarian exactly reverses this order. The Sabbath is the all-important thing, a rigid, iron rule, unbending and inflexible. Man and his necessities and his good are of little or no account in comparison with the supremely great duty to keep the Sabbath. "Man was made for the Sabbath, and not the Sabbath for man," would much better express their idea of the relative relation and importance of the two. It is well for the people and the world that such pharisaical ideas have found few advocates in the church of Christ.

THE PRESENT SYRIA.

[Extracts from a letter from Ira Harris, M. D., a graduate of Albany Medical College, Albany, N. Y., Medical Missionary stationed at Tripoli, Syria.]

BEYROUT, Syria.

My Dear Doctor:

My health is improving slowly and I am impatient to get to work again. .....We are 2500 feet above the sea. The temperature is 86 deg., from 8 a. m., to 6 p. m. The nights are cool; this partly takes off the ill effects of the day's heat. Down in Beyrout the temperature is from 90 to 98 degrees, daily. Last week I visited the city, and was glad to get back to a cooler place.

Those Sarpot sigi, mentioned in the Independent last April, have been taken to Constantinople, to be placed in the Government Museum. I tried my best to get negatives of them, but the director saw to it that no one stole his thunder. He is going to write a book on the grand find. Sidon is the oasis of Syria, for antiquities. I have many in my collection, from that place.

Last spring I visited Palmyra. The journey is so long and the country so full of wild Arabs, that travellers seldom visit the place. I had a chance to join a government party. I had a grand time, and came away with substantial evidence of my visit, including four dozen excellent photograph negatives, taken under difficulties; this gives additional value to them.

Next month I visit Mount Hermon. This venerable hoary-headed mountain is only fifteen hours from here. Will take a tent, and will probably camp some days on and in the vicinity of the "Baal-Hermon." Old Cæsarea Philippi lies at the southern base; also the great fountain of the Jordan, near this is Tel-el-Kady, the Dan of the children of Israel. This will be my second visit to that vicinity, so I can get the places more deeply impressed on my mind.

Beyrout has just gotten over a severe epidemic of small-pox,—over two thousand deaths. When we see the freedom allowed to persons affected, we do wonder that any escaped taking the disease. The government officials take no notice, other than to keep their precious bodies out of danger; this they do effectually, leaving the people to do just as they please.

In the city of Hunes, they have every year an epidemic of diptheria. Since 1885 there have died over 3000 from the disease. I have full notes, and some interesting facts connected with treatment, etc.

One of the "funny" sights to be seen in the homes of these simple mountaineers, is the stuffing of the sheep. The old custom of purchasing a lamb in the spring, to fatten through the summer, still prevails in Syria. The mode of feeding is for the women to take a mulberry leaf, wrap it around some moist meal, open the lamb's mouth, and push it down its throat with the finger, at the same time stretching the neck to insure the passage of the food into the stomach. They repeat the feeding every two hours. The poor beast's digestive organs sometimes will not submit to this overwork, and refuse to fulfill their functions. I was once called to prescribe for a sick sheep. I said I knew very little about the diseases of sheep, but would offer a suggestion, not to stuff it as they were doing. They laughed and kept on. The animal did not improve. When nearly dead they killed it, and the family made a feast, and ate it. They did not seem to be the worse for their repast.

One of the American ladies called at a village near here to read to the women. They assembled at a house. Fourteen women came, each bringing a sheep, and food. During the reading, these women kept the stuffing process going, thus combining business with pleasure.

I visited Jerusalem last spring. I stopped at the Prussian Hospice. I found some of the books and publications like those you gave me before I left the United States. [THE RESTITUTION, of Plymouth, Indiana, Lost Israel Identification Society's tracts, etc.] How they came to be sent to this far-away city, no one knows, excepting the donors. They look as if they had been well-read.....Sincerely yours,

IRA HARRIS.

There is trouble in the Samoan group of Islands, arising from the displacement by Germany, backed up by man-of-war, of Malietoa in favor of Tamasese as king of Samoa. War threatens. The American and British consuls have published the following card:

Whereas, The Government of Germany has this day proclaimed Tamasese King of Samoa, now we the undersigned representatives of the United States of America and of Great Britain, hereby give notice that we and our Governments do not, and never have recognized Tamasese as King of Samoa, but continue as heretofore to recognize Malietoa. We advise all Samoans to submit quietly, not to fight, whatever their provocation, but to await peaceably the result of deliberations now in progress, which alone can determine the future of Samoa."

The Annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, will be held at Plymouth, Ind., on Saturday, Nov. 12, 1887, for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors, and for the transaction of such business as may come before the meeting.

BY ORDER OF THE BOARD.

AMONG the interesting articles and contributions that we expect to lay before our readers next week will be a letter from Torre Pellice, Italy, written by O. Coisson, Editor and Publisher of a periodical in the Italian language entitled The Bible Bee.

As the time is now at hand for the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, we can only say to our readers that we do not know whether our connection, as Editor of THE RESTITUTION, will close at that time or not. We may not Edit more than three numbers more of THE RESTITUTION. We most heartily wish that our brethren might find one to fill the place of Editor far better qualified in every respect than ourself. May God direct in this, and in all other matters pertaining to the advancement of his precious cause.

BROTHER Silas Hoen, of Dudley, England, is writing a few articles in the endeavor to prove that there will be a future antichrist manifested as an individual person before the final establishment of the Kingdom of God under the administration of his Son, our Lord Jesus Christ. While according to our esteemed and talented brother the opportunity to present his reasons for his belief, we must say for ourself, that it is a view that, as yet, has never won the assent of our own mind. Without directly controverting the views of our worthy correspondent we shall place the other side of the question before our readers, in some articles both selected and original and leave our readers to draw their own conclusions.

THE CRUELTIES OF FASHION.

It is with pleasure that we give the following article a place in THE RESTITUTION. It was written for The Union Signal by the gifted authoress, and by her sent to be reprinted in our paper. The short introduction is from the Editor of the Signal. The writer of this pungent article has written several books and pamphlets that have won for her admiration and applause both in our own country and in Europe. It is a horrible spectacle to see a man brutalized by avarice; but demonized is hardly expressive enough to characterize men guilty of such atrocious acts of torturing anguish inflicted upon God's harmless and beautiful creatures as Mrs. Reed holds up to the scorn of all true womanhood. We hope her plain, pointed, withering admonitions will be heeded. If any of us have sinned thoughtlessly, in using such decorations, let our repentance be deeply sincere, and our reformation correspondently thorough.—[ED. RES.]

TORTOISE SHELL.

[Our readers will be shocked, as we are, at the brutality exposed in this article, and we trust will give expression to their convictions in the practical way Mrs. Reed suggests.—Ed. Signal.]

The Chicago Times recently contained an account of the process whereby tortoise shell was obtained, which will doubtless be new to some of our readers. It seems that the variety of tortoise that furnishes the finest shell for commerce, is captured and kept in vats until ready to be operated upon. The tortoise is then secured in position before a fire and slowly roasted until his back is sufficiently cooked to cleave easily from the shell, which is then cut from the lower parts, and torn from the roasted flesh of the victim. After which the tortoise is put back into the vats and in a year nature will have so far repaired the damage that the same victim can be again roasted and shelled alive. This sketch has not been repeated for amusement, but simply as a matter of duty—that American ladies may respond to this mute appeal of animal suffering, by forever avoiding even the imitation of tortoise shell ornaments.

Give the avaricious brutes who can be guilty of such an outrage to understand that every good woman, every humane woman, nay every human woman, on earth, will condemn such practices. Women can make tortoise shell unfashionable, and thereby take it from the market, if all women will join in the movement. American women have saved thousands and millions of birds by refusing to trim their hats and bonnets with the pitiful little corpses, and it is a resolution worthy of them.

It is true there are still some—you may call them ladies if you choose, but I object to their wearing the grander name of woman—who are perfectly willing that God's loveliest humming birds shall be skinned alive, in order to preserve the beauty of the plumage, wherewith, to gratify their vanity. They would claim they didn't want it done, and they are so very sensitive that they couldn't look on and see it done, but they will pay handsomely for the skin, provided the quivering bird is kept out of their sight while the slow torture is going on. The painted squaw who gaily adorns herself with a scalp of golden curls from the head of an innocent child, exhibits the same sweet spirit of tenderness and compassion as does the painted white woman who decorates herself with the skins of tortured birds.

One of Will Carleton's characters is represented as feeling that

> "Nothing is too good and nothing too nice,
> And nothing she won't get for
> For the one she loves,
> And when all is said and done,
> She 'hasn't only' to 'ask and have.'"

and Will was right, for we occasionally see just such a character, but we have reason to be thankful, that the mass of women were cast in a grander mould, that they will not allow birds, beasts, mice, nor even a snake put to torture to gratify their vanity.

There are some things that women cannot accomplish alone, yes, many of them, but if all of us will try, we can stop the roasting alive of the helpless tortoise, and the skinning alive of God's loveliest birds.

Shall we do it? Do we care enough for this thing to stamp it forever out of existence, or shall we merely shudder at the horrid details, and feel that it is very cruel to have such subjects presented to our sensitive nerves, and go on wearing tortoise shell or its imitations, and continue to trim our bonnets with the pitiful corpse of a martyred bird? Some one will ask what harm there is in wearing imitation tortoise shell? The answer is, it helps to keep up the fashion of the genuine article and knowing the whole story, a piece of even imitation shell will be revolting to the feelings of a genuine woman. Let us be true to ourselves and true to each other; let us be true to the Lord who bought us, and loyal to his creatures. Let us teach our daughters that true womanhood will not encourage torture for the sake of vanity; will not degrade their own souls by offering a premium to horrible brutality; will not outrage God and humanity for the sake of an additional ornament.—Mrs. H. V. Reed.

Romanism in the United States.

In our last week's issue we gave an account of the martyrdom of three persons in Mexico as a result of the intolerance of Romanism in that Priest-ridden country. Below we give two examples of the workings of the same detestable system in our own country. We take the first from the Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times regarding the shameful violations of the laws both in Wisconsin and Minnesota. The next article—"A Godless School"—we take from the New York Observer, which refers to affairs in Pittsburgh, Pa. The last—"Protestants Aroused"—is from the Grove City Telephone. For ourselves we regard Papal Romanism as a mortal foe to the Public Schools; and not only so, but to all the free institutions of this country. A designed enemy of the Bible, and of Bible Christianity, could not be otherwise.

An attack on the Public School System is reported from the Northwest. The Roman Catholics are endeavoring to so curtail the efficiency and development of the public schools as to fill sectarian schools with the children for whom the public schools have no provision. The Evening Post mentions several movements of this character. At Harlow, Wis., the Roman Catholics attended the annual meeting in force, and passed a resolution that no public school should be maintained for a year. At Melrose, Minn., the priests succeeded in getting the public school year shortened, thus giving the parents the option of letting the children remain idle or sending them to the Romanist schools. And in Stearns County, Minn., the Romanist catechism is openly taught in the schools in defiance of law, while religious instruction is given by the priests either at the opening or closing of the schools. These are startling facts, which must convince the most apathetic that a very serious danger menaces the system of which the nation is justly proud.

A "GODLESS" SCHOOL.

Pittsburgh presents the climax of Roman Catholic arrogance in destroying or capturing our public schools. Father McTighe, of St. Michael's church, has actually succeeded in having himself appointed principal of the 33d ward public school in that city. This is the very consummation of unprincipled audacity. Having denounced the schools officially everywhere as "immoral and godless," a priest sanctioned by his superiors, takes possession and pretends to administer an "immoral, godless" school. Either he intends secretly to make it Romanist or else he attempts to do precisely what Protestants wish, and therefore stultifies himself and his church as natters of our public schools. It is believed that he intends to keep what he and his church call a "godless" school during the regular school hours, and then retain all those who will stay, for the purpose of giving them religous teaching in other hours. It is said that the nuns are to be employed as teachers. Such an illustration as this of the purpose and spirit of Romanists ought to rouse the nation. They ought to be taught a lesson now which will need no repetition. Our people will not tolerate this trifling with the very first principles of our polity, namely, that the State shall not in any way whatever engage in sectarian education, sectarian benevolence, or sectarian enterprises of any kind whatever. It is a disgrace to the civilization of any neighborhood, when it permits, for the sake of conciliating the enemies of the public schools, these gross violations of both the letter and spirit of our laws.

PROTESTANTS AROUSED.

The National Grand Lodge of the Junior American Protestant Association in session at Reading, Pa., passed the following resolutions:

Whereas, at a meeting with closed doors in Pittsburgh the School Board elected as Principal of the Monongahela Public School Rev. Father McTighe, acting as Priest of St. Michael's Roman Catholic Church, and, whereas, such election is repugnant to every American Protestant, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Grand Lodge Jr. A. P. A., in annual session in the city of Reading, hereby enters its solemn protest against the action of said Board.

That it recognizes the public schools of our land as the basis of our free institutions, and to that end they should be exclusively in charge of those whose fidelity to that truth and liberty is native and potent, which the powers of Rome would extirpate by destroying the Word of God.

That giving their representatives places in our political economy is subversive of that moral training which, under the guiding hand of Providence, has so wonderfully prospered us as a nation.

That the Catholic Church is secretly and insidiously at work establishing herself in our midst for the destruction of that most glorious privilege—"liberty of conscience"—which to preserve inviolate, should be the purpose of Protestantship and Protestant Christianity.

That if 'eternal vigilance is the price of liberty' we must put more on guard who will connive at the open or covert attacks of our enemy.

Resolved that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the secretary of said School Board, as well as the Superintendent of public schools.

Selections.

DANIEL'S VISION OF THE FOURTH EMPIRE.

That Daniel's vision of the fourth beast, chap. vii. 2-27, represents the same power as is presented to us in Rev. xiii., is manifest from the following considerations:

1. That the "fourth beast" of Daniel's vision represented the Roman Empire is universally admitted.

2. That the ten horns, both in the visions of Daniel and John, represent ten kingdoms into which that empire was to be—in some period, future, from the times of both Daniel and John—divided.

3. That the little horn of Daniel's vision, rising up in the midst of the ten, and before which three of the other horns fell, is identical in character with the "Second beast" of John's vision.

4. That the period in which they have power to persecute is the same in point of duration, variously expressed as a "time, times and half a time," 42 months, and 1260 days or years.

5. That both continue in existence to the coming of Christ. And every feature indicated in these combined visions is found and seen to be distinctly prominent in the Papacy, though we are aware that the half-hearted Protestantism of the nineteenth century—especially that which has grown up under the deadly night-shade of the Universities—rejoices in its breadth of view and sympathy, and while it coquets with the Papacy, seeks to fling the veil over its sanguinary history, to palliate its errors, and to extenuate its crimes. The harlot of Apocalyptic vision, which John saw reeling down through the avenue of history, drunk with the blood of the saints and the martyrs of Jesus, is—in the opinion of the silver-slippered religionist of the nineteenth century—to be pitied rather than blamed; and because she can no longer quench her thirst in the blood of the saints, her enforced abstinence is regarded as a virtue indicative of her penitence for the past, and as assuring her good behavior for the future. But the Romish harlot boasts that she is infallible, and whatever others may do or say on her behalf, she has never yet confessed her sins, nor mourned over the sanguinary deeds of her past history.

1. The Papacy began to assume a prominent position about the same time that the ten kingdoms were forming out of the wreck of the old Roman Empire.

2. It "exercised" or gained all their power to carry on its work of persecution through all the countries of Europe.

3. Three horns, or kingdoms, were plucked up before it, and given to it by Pepin Le Bref and Charlemagne, namely, the Dukedom of Rome, the Exarchate of Ravenna, and the Kingdom of Lombardy, and in commemoration of the event, the Popes wear a triple crown.

4. The time when all authority (over the churches) was given its hand, was—as we have before remarked—A. D. 606–608; and the actual time when its power to persecute, ceased—even in Rome itself—was A. D. 1870, when the Italian troops took possession of the eternal city—1262 years. [See remarks at end of this article.]

In relation to the division of the Roman Empire into ten kingdoms, we give the following from Machiavelli, a Catholic by religious profession, but a sceptic in fact, and who, of course, wrote without reference to prophetic views of any kind—Futurist or Historic—and is, therefore, a perfectly independent witness: 1. The Dukedom of Rome; 2. The Exarchate of Ravenna; 3. The Kingdom of Lombardy, (in relation to these three there is a general unanimity among expositors); 4. The Kingdom of the Vandals; 5. The Suevi; 6. The Alimanni; 7. The Burgundians; 8. The Franks; 9. The Visigoths; 10. The Angle Saxons. And with these agree Mede, Bishop Lloyd, Sir Isaac Newton, G. S. Faber; and with one exception in each case, Whiston and Bishop Newton; and with substituting the modern names of those kingdoms, Bishop Chandler, Daubuz and Allix, and Messrs. Cuninghame, Frere, and Habershon. And at the time of the Reformation, the ten kingdoms were, 1. Italy; 2. Germany; 3. France; 4. Spain; 5. Portugal; 6. Scotland (then an independent kingdom); 7. Hungary; 8. Poland; 9. Denmark; 10. England. — From The Closing Days of Christendom, by Burlington B. Wale.

Just 1260 years from the death of Phocas, A. D. 610. Bower, speaking of the imperial edict of Phocas, vesting the Pope with the title of universal bishop and declaring him the "head of the church," says: "The imperial edict therefore, if we may so call the edict of an usurper and a tyrant, was not as popish writers pretend, a bare confirmation of the primacy of the see of Rome; but the grant of a new title, which the pope immediately improved into a power answering to the title. And thus was the power of the pope as universal bishop, as 'head of the church,' or in other words the papal supremacy, first introduced. It owed its original to the worst of men; was procured by the basest means, by flattering a tyrant; and was in itself, if we stand to the judgment of Gregory the Great, antichristian, heretical, blasphemous, diabolical."

Bower further says: "It were to be wished the successors of Boniface had been satisfied with the title, which he procured for them, and even with the power of universal bishops. But no sooner had they brought that power to its highest pitch, than they began to extend their views, to join insensibly the temporal to the spiritual power; nor did their boundless ambition allow them, or the world, to enjoy any rest till they got themselves acknowledged for universal monarchs as well as universal bishops, as we shall see in the sequel of this history." In A. D. 809, says Bower, "The new pope" (Boniface IV) "availing himself of the partiality of Phocas to his see, begged of him the famous Pantheon; and having obtained it, (for the tyrant could refuse nothing to the pope, the only friends he had in the whole empire), he changed it into a church, substituting the Mother of God to the mother of the gods, and the Christian martyrs to the other pagan deities adored there before; so that only the names of the idols were altered."

We may add that the Pantheon was a heathen temple erected by M. Agrippa, the son-in-law of Augustus, B. C. 26, and dedicated to the honor of Cybele, known in Greek and Roman mythology as the mother of the highest gods and goddesses. It was not only dedicated to her worship, but also to the worship of all the gods. Hence its name. Here in 607–610, commenced the power of the Papal Pontifex Maximus to rule over all the churches as well as to institute a new form of idolatry in an Idol Temple.—ED. RES.]

The immediate cause of the surpassing fertility of the Nile Valley is well known to be a deposition of rich silt from the waters of the annual inundation; but the remote cause or source of the fertilising silt has been a mystery for ages. Even yet the explanation is not popularly known because never, so far as we are aware, collected or thrown into succinct form from its disclosure in the report of Sir Samuel Baker's expedition to the Nile tributaries of Abyssinia. Lately in his "Mount-Soir," Prof. Edward Hull has reduced the scientific relation to a brief and simple account which should clear up the mystery generally and forever.

The Nile below Khartum consists of one undivided stream; but at El Damer, about 170 geographical miles lower down, it receives the waters of a great tributary, the Atbara, descending from the highlands of Abyssinia. This river undergoes the most extreme transformations. During the early months of the year the waters are so reduced as sometimes to form only series of great, stagnant pools, in which are collected in very close quarters all the aquatic inhabitants, consisting of fishes, crocodiles, and huge tortoise. The banks, through a long line of country at the base of the mountains are formed of masses of mud and silt, easily undermined and liable to fall into the waters on the rise of the river. About June tremendous thunder-storms, accompanied by deluges of rain, break on the Abyssinian highlands. The waters of the Atbara rise with extraordinary rapidity, and descend with a roar like that of distant thunder, giving warning of the approaching deluge. Soon the channel is filled up with the flood, the banks of mud are undermined, and fall down in large masses into the waters, where they are speedily broken up and converted into silt, the finer portions of which being carried along finally enter the Nile, and impart to its waters much of the turbid character for which they are known in Lower Egypt. A good deal of sediment is also brought down by the Bahr el-Azrek, or the Blue [dirty-watered] Nile, some of the sources of which also are found in the Abyssinian highlands. The river now becomes a great fertilising agent, and when allowed to flow over the cultivated fields imparts the necessary moisture; so that, under the influence of a powerful sun, two or three crops can be annually gathered off the land; giving rise to an extraordinary amount of natural wealth. That this sediment originally caused Lower Egypt to be reclaimed from the Mediterranean Sea was known to Herodotus, who calls this country 'the gift of the Nile.'"—N. Y. Independent.

Dear Restitution:

Enclosed find two dollars and sixty cents for which please credit two dollars on RESTITUTION and send tracts for the balance. In my last communication I wrote that an interest had been aroused in the precious truths of the Bible. The investigation has resulted so far in the noble confession being made by nine at our last meeting. Seven of the number were baptized into the saving name of the Life Giver, the baptism of two being postponed. The scene brought vividly to mind incidents that took place in Indiana when a large concourse of people assembled to witness the ceremony of putting on Christ by a burial in the watery tomb. A discourse was delivered to an attentive audience, the theme being, "Man's Relation to Future Life," or how immortality is to be obtained. The interest still continues but the opposition is fierce and bitter. Houses of worship are closed against us, but dwelling houses are put in condition to hold meetings in. But puny man might as well forbid the sun to shine as to forbid honest seekers after truth to investigate the Bible. Our hearts are filled with gratitude to God for the grand victory the truth has gained. Yes, thank God, "the Bible is triumphant" here now; No banner of truth has been grasped by nine converts for Christ, and in the name of the Captain of our salvation we trust that glorious banner may be held aloft and never soiled by the dust of human tradition. Amen. Yours rejoicing in the truth. J. F. WAGONER.

Dear Restitution:

Enclosed find order for two dollars to apply on the paper. Reporting labor would say that I have preached to the church I organized for two years up to the present time, and have been wonderfully blessed in seeing the power of the gospel of God among the people. Have baptized in the last three weeks, twenty-one, in the beautiful Clear Lake in the likeness of our blessed Lord's death. Ordained one brother to the ministry. My Sunday School has been a grand success. May heaven keep us to the end, amen.

Have been preaching to the Church of God at Andover, Dak., over Sunday. Find Elder Halstead a staunch, sturdy, Christian man, well beloved by his people and respected by all. I will remain with them for a few evenings as there are omens of good. Will say to any or all of the RESTITUTION brethren that I will be at liberty this winter to preach the word as the way may open. Address me at Sac City, Iowa. Yours in hope, C. W. PITSON.

Dear Restitution:

As we are about to leave this place I will want you to change my address from Dakota to Iowa. We are too lonely to stay here. The grand old gospel has never been proclaimed in this vicinity. The people seem to have but little or no love for Christianity. It is a new country and thinly settled, and is not the place for old people like we are. We have felt so isolated walking alone, yet we are not alone, for those wonderful words of the Master just before he suffered are as sacred to his followers now as when they fell from his hallowed lips eighteen hundred years ago, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you." Every member of the family of God can or may realize the sweetness of those words. My hope is that he will not tarry. Oh, that the Life Giver would soon come. May we all be ready and able to say amen and amen. So come Lord Jesus, come quickly. Thou wilt save us. Yours in love. MARGARET HAYNES.

To the Faithful in Christ Greeting.

"The Lord will give grace and glory, no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly."

Beloved in Christ: Ere these lines reach you, we hope to be on the Pacific Coast. Medical advice as well as close observation induces us to make this move, in the hope of benefiting my health. I hope in a more genial clime to so renew my strength, as to be able to lift my pen as in the past in the interests of the truth. Let us one and all, watch and pray that we enter not into temptation.

Should any wish to obtain my little book "The Heir of All Things," I will as in the past forward it for the price named in THE RESTITUTION. Or if unable to pay it shall be free. My address will be San Diego, California.

When Will the Kingdom Come.

The kingdom is dependent upon a certain number of elect ones that must previously be gathered out. After the rejection of the Jewish nation for a set time, a seed must be raised up unto Abraham to inherit the promises; this seed is now in process of adoption, and when a determinate number has been thus ingrafted—a sufficiency to fill out the divine theocratic purpose—then will the kingdom come. This number requisite, God only knows; it is one of the secrets that pertains to himself alone, as the bestower of the kingdom to David's Son, and his co-heirs, and which he has purposely clad in symbolic vesture, and in the most general expressions. To make up this predeterminate number, is assigned as a reason why God is delaying his promises (2 Peter iii. 9, etc.) so that by the exercise of long-suffering, men may be led to repentance, and become of the number of the elect, chosen ones. Hence, while this necessarily forbids the fixing of a definite time, owing to man's utter inability to fathom the theocratic ordering of the kingdom in its appointments, etc., yet, at the same time, the thoughtful student will feel, when looking at the number already gathered during eighteen centuries of contest and trial, that, at least, a very large advancement has been made in gathering out such a seed for Abraham, to be co-inheritors with the Christ. Therefore, from this even, it is reasonable to think that the kingdom is not far distant, seeing that already so much has been done to secure such a class.—The Theocratic Kingdom.

A Blessing or a Curse.

Two Scotchmen emigrated in the early days to California. Each thought to take with them some memorial of their beloved country. The one of them, an enthusiastic lover of Scotland, took with him a thistle, the national emblem. The other took a small sample of honey bee. Years have passed away. The Pacific coast is, on the one hand, cursed with the Scotch thistle, which the farmers find it impossible to exterminate; on the other hand, the forests and fields are fragrant and laden with the sweetness of honey, which has been and is still one of the blessings of the western slope of the Rocky Mountains. Even so does every Christian carry with him some thing plucked from the old man, or honey from the new man, with which to bless or curse men according as he makes choice for God. How precious is our influence; how we should watch and guard it.—Words and Weapons.

Can anyone give us the present address of any of the following persons. They have left their old homes, and gone away leaving their accounts with us unsettled, and we wish their addresses that we may place the accounts in the hands of a collector for settlement.

We have waited on these and some others, until they have, by their conduct, all but proved false, and if we can find any one of all of them we will try and find out why they do not pay.

"WHOM HAVING NOT SEEN, YE LOVE."—1 Peter i. 8.

Savior, my feet have never trod with thine
The "solitary place,"
My eyes have never seen, in human form,
Thy manifested grace;
My hands have never touched thy garment's hem,
With faith's unerring plea,
Nor hast thou tarried, when the day was spent,
And broken bread with me.

But, Lord, my mental feet are steadfast set
Upon the King's Highway,
And though as yet I may not see thy face,
I follow on each day;
My waiting eyes are unto thee, dear Lord,
In whom I live and move,
Whose love, to Heaven, is the fait at best
That earth or heaven can prove.

The needs be of thy ways may not be clear
To my imperfect sight;
Love trusts them wholly, where it cannot trace,
And knows that all is right.
It is enough for me by faith to stay
My hidden life on thee,
And in the secret of thy covenant
To rest implicitly.

I know that thou art gone to beautify
A place in heaven for me,
And when thou comest to take thy children home
I shall be like to thee.
Then shall I wake, and see thee eye to eye,
Whom now, unseen, I love;
Faith's darkly pictured glass exchanged at last
For rapturous sight above.

A Pleasant Trip and Visit. No. 2.

After leaving Niagara we were soon looking upon what once was the "far West." How much labor is involved in the cleared land; how many have toiled to clear for house and home—in these parts it is not as apparent as where not only trees, but stones have had to be gotten out of the way! All praise to the pioneers who have steadily broken down barriers, and opened up a country where civilization, commerce and art are, where once the rude savage, as we call the poor Indian, made it his home! How self-satisfied we are with the newly coined words—"Survival of the fittest," and settle down with the belief that we are the "fittest!" It is even possible that such we are not; and although mighty and majestic strides have been made to bring the earth into subjection, how far from this is the creature man! Man, proud man, is a boastful creature, no less so now than was the King of Babylon, who was brought very low, even to see his kingdom vanish, and he reduced to a level he dreamed not of. Being somewhat of a hero worshiper, for as was well said at the Brooklyn Convention, we have heroes today every way equal to those gone before, and who are held up as models to pattern after. Yea we have not only heroes but martyrs, who for the maintainance and defence of unpopular truths are ostracised by "respectable" society, and who if not burned at the stake, are branded, and the warning voice is given, if not from pulpit or platform, it is by innuendo; and if the alarm of mad dog is not sounded—bad dog is.

Passing through London, Ont., we decided to make an evening call on our Bro. W. G. Moncrieff, and holding him as one who had well earned the title of hero, we felt we should be honored if only we could converse for a short time with him. Having recently visited London, England, I was qualified to compare the London we were in and that, and as I thought of the restless millions now peopling old London, and the seeming quiet of this pretty place, my mind was carried back, as history has given it to us, to the earlier and very rude character of the early Britons. And I could but feel grateful that I lived not then, but now! Our visit at our Bro's. was quite short, but one long to be remembered; and as we parted we could, and did sincerely wish that the days of his usefulness were far from being past, and that yet, rays of light may come from his pen, as they have in the past to break through darkness which may indeed well be called such! Thank God, there are not only scintillations but broad beams now flooding the world on the glorious truths of "life only in Christ" and doctrines immediately connected therewith; this, and other things gladdens me, and makes me to rejoice that labors of the past have not been in vain!

On, on at the height of steam speed are we carried forward to our point of destiny, at which we arrived one day before time; we were assured by the man who conveyed us that Bro. Grant would take us in hand and do well by us; as he deposited us at this pleasant farm home, where we were welcomed by Sr. Grant; it did not take us long to get out into the fields and find Bro. Grant, who at once made us feel at home; and yet, here we were hundreds of miles from home; but our Father's children were here, and we all speak the language known to those who have "like precious faith."

Our visiting here was one round of pleasure and profit. We met with some of whom we only knew by seeing their names in "THE RESTITUTION," but now we could grasp their hands, look into their faces, hear their voices, and feel free in their presence. With two exceptions—Bro. Chaplin and Sister Woodward, all were unknown to us; and as we looked upon the venerable forms of these patriarchs in the gospel hope, we felt glad. We were also gladdened at the presence of so many young persons, who declared their determination to hold fast to the form of sound words, and their faith in all the promises of Jehovah. These will soon be called to fill up the ranks of those who may fall by the enemy death; therefore, how important they should not only say this, and ask an interest in the prayers of others, but give themselves to reading, as the apostle Paul advised Timothy.

The young believer excites my sympathy, and I feel like saying to all such "Take heed lest ye fall;" for, snares, pits, and footfalls are just ahead of you; look to the blessed Savior, and put very little trust in man; his breath is in his nostrils, and as a leader he is scarcely to be counted on! We who have journeyed the road these many years can advise from the standpoint of experience: and some of us have bought this at considerable cost.

From Thursday night to Sunday night great harmony prevailed, and it was indeed good to see brethren and sisters dwelling together in unity.

Our going to Watson Conference was that we might know more of the Western brethren, we had no thought of being called upon to preach, believing this would be attended to by others better qualified, but in answer to solicitations Bro. S. Wilson and myself gave our contribution of testimony from the word of the Lord. If any seeds of truth were sown in good and honest hearts the day will declare it; let us hope that what was done in weakness, may help some fainting soul to take courage and continue to fight the good fight of faith, laying hold on the life that is life indeed.

We were all greatly edified by the words of our esteemed Bro. Chaplin, his exposition as to the "Thief on the cross," Whether in the body, etc." "Baptism"—"Lord's Supper"—"The Fig tree"—and other most excellent words, found, and I trust will continue to hold a place in my memory.

During our session the several Committees reported, and I leave them, or their Sec. to fill out what I leave unsaid.

Both Bro. Wilson and myself were indeed well "taken in hand," and the hospitality of our Bro. Houser and family, also Bros. Kent, Pike and others, who contributed to freely to the entertaining of such as were to them strangers heretofore.

I must leave others to tell how they enjoyed or were helped on by this annual gathering.

One thing I must not pass by, and that is, the kind feelings expressed with reference to "Words of Truth" and "The Rock" publications of the A. P. O. K., Bro. Woodward never ceased praising these, and telling how helpful they had been to him in his preaching travels. We said then, what we again repeat, Our work in this effort of publishing is, that a pure gospel shall be given, and as heretofore, so in the future, these shall not give forth any uncertain sound, but sound words which cannot be gainsaid:—the Editor and other officers of the Assn., are fallible men, and need, and ask the prayers of all God's people who love the truth, that they speak through these channels "None other things than these which are plainly given to us of God in the Word of the gospel."

It was very gratifying to have so many come forward, and from five cents to one dollar show their readiness to take hold, and help others push on, forward, and never tiring degree, this work of spreading a knowledge of such truths, as shall free the minds of many, who are waiting the dawn of truth! That there are such, and many too, we have abundant reason to hope and believe.

By comparing notes, it was truly pleasing to find that the faith of the gospel was not confined to the East; but, that those in Watson, Byron Centre—Vicksburgh and elsewhere in the West, hoped the same things, believed the same things, this was well illustrated in a stirring discourse by Bro. Woodward concerning the promise of God relating to the Davidic throne, and sceptre of universal sway, as shall be, when David's Lord and Son shall take to himself his power, and become King. If there were any dissenting to this clear presentation of Bible truth, I did not hear it, and I do not think there were any who could but say with Bro. Woodward, and with David, Amen and Amen, let the whole earth be filled with his glory!

The time for parting came, and as is always the case, regrets are felt and expressed, we have every reason to believe these were genuine.

An hour or so delay, waiting the train to bear us onward, gave us an opportunity to talk over the experiences of the past, and to feel encouraged thereby to hold fast the beginning of our confidence firm unto the end.

GEO. W. YOUNG.

THE PAPACY AND THE MAN OF SIN NOT IDENTICAL.—No. 2.

When the man of sin is revealed, "darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people;" the whole earth—the whole of earth's inhabitants are to wonder after the beast, "and all that dwell on the earth shall worship him, every one whose name hath not been written in the Lamb's book of life." Now those who teach that the man of sin has been revealed in the Papacy, or the succession of popes, must show that this has been the state of the world for 1260 years, the period that the Papacy has had power. We insist that this is a point that cannot be evaded. If they cannot show this, their system of interpretation is proved to be false. Yet who would undertake such a task? To undertake such a task would be to unsay thousands of their own sayings in regard to the spread of light and truth, and the worship of the true God. This revelation of the man of sin, this wide-spread worship of the antichrist, cannot take place till the church are removed.

The 1260 days, according to the year-day theory, have passed; dating from the year 533, or rather, dating from the year 606,—the latest date usually fixed upon,—they were fulfilled twenty years ago; yet the end is not reached. At the close of these days certain things are predicted to take place which have not yet taken place, which evinces the year-day theory to be a false theory.

Before the seven bowls are poured out, before even the first is poured out, John sees those as victors who refuse the worship of the beast; they are in the midst of the persecution and strife, and overcome. "And I saw as it were a glassy sea mingled with fire; and them that come victorious from the beast, and from his image, and from the number of his name, standing by the glassy sea, having harps of God." Rev. xv. 2. But the worship of the beast and his image is not yet set up; and hence these conquerors are yet future, and also the seven bowls, although some affirm we are living under the sixth.

The phrase, a "glassy sea mingled with fire," refers doubtless to the purifying influence of the fiery trials. The chastisement is severe, the scourging is sharp and painful; but the beneficial effects are great and permanent.

After the hour of God's judgment is come, and Babylon is just on the point of falling, the man of sin persecutes those who will not worship him. This beast, this head of the fourth world-power has yet to arise; the evidence is clear that he is still future. The two witnesses of Rev. xi. are put to death by this beast. In this chapter he is said to come up out of the abyss, and in the 13th chapter he is said to come up out of the sea. The killing of the two witnesses, with some other events, are included in the second woe. But as these events have not yet taken place, the second woe is still future.

According to Paul, 2 Thess. ii. 4, "the man of sin" is to sit "in the temple of God, setting himself forth as God." And this agrees with the prediction of Daniel, and also with the prediction of Christ, which is a repetition of Daniel's, and shows clearly that the temple in Jerusalem is meant. But seeing that this is opposed to the theory that the Papacy is the man of sin, the popes having had no footing in Jerusalem, and the temple of God, during the existence of the Papacy, not having had an existence. It is sought to make the temple of God in this passage mean something else. Dr. Jordan, knowing that the plain grammatical sense of the passage is opposed to this theory, says, "This particular phrase, "temple of God," is never in a single instance in the New Testament applied to the temple at Jerusalem; but always to the church, the body of Christ, to its head or to its members in heaven or on earth." Now this is so manifestly untrue, that such a statement can only come from one who is biassed in his judgment, nor can it be received by any but the prejudiced. If the phrase, "temple of God," is always applied to the church, of course it must be so here. How will it read then to say that the man of sin sitteth in the church, setting himself forth as God? The phrase, indeed, is used figuratively of the church in 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17: "Know ye not that ye are a temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?....for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." But to explain the Papacy to be the man of sin, and the temple of God in which he sits to be the church, is just asserting that this blasphemer, in the succession of popes, has been sitting in the Church where the Holy Spirit dwelleth, setting himself forth as God. Such an interpretation needs no refutation; it refutes itself. But the incongruity of this is thought to be set aside by regarding the Church as having become apostate. What church become apostate? The church called the temple of God, and which is declared to be holy, and to be the abode of the Spirit of God? Never, no, never. The church of Rome, as such, of which the pope is the head, is an apostate church; but that is not the church Paul calls the temple of God, and in which the Spirit dwells, and which is holy. In referring to all the visible organizations throughout the world, containing many who are more professors of religion as well as the few who are possessors, we not unfrequently apply to them, in the aggregate, the word church; but in this broad sense it is not used in the New Testament. It is used there to signify the body of faithful believers, the body of Christ, the bride of Christ.

SILAS HENN.

2 Corinthians v. 1.

The earthly house, tabernacle, building mentioned in the above text may have reference to the present life in mortal flesh. But I think it will bear another interpretation. I wish here to note some inexplicable difficulties in the way of accepting the common view of the subject.

If the earthly house is the mortal body, it follows that the house not made with hands, is a body. It seems fair to infer that the house to be dissolved was made with hands; which could not be said of the mortal body. But we are told by some, that the disembodied spirit is better off without a body. That it is a clog, a prison to the spirit, from which it is to be freed at death.

What can a disembodied spirit do with two bodies—One from the grave, the other "Eternal in the heavens?" Giving to every individual a house to loll! When every one would be better off without any.

There was a tabernacle made with hands according to a pattern shown to Moses in the mount, Heb. viii. 5. This tabernacle, with its priesthood, its sanctuary service, and its ordinances, was being "dissolved" and passing away, in Paul's day. "But Christ being an High Priest of good things to come by a greater and more perfect tabernacle not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building," Heb. ix. 11. "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands which are figures of the true; but into heaven itself now to appear in the presence of God for us," Heb. x. 24. Paul "desired to be clothed upon with the house which is from heaven." We now look for such a building, house, tabernacle from heaven. The prophet Ezekiel has spoken, ch. xxxvii. vs. 26, 27, "I will place them and multiply them and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them, for evermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people." "And I John saw the holy city, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men and he shall dwell with them," Rev. xxi. 1.

The Question of Headship.

We all know that the meanest and mightiest animals that exist as living creatures on earth have a head; and those that spring from the earth as its vegetation have a root. Nay more; even the ordinances of religion have some originating event that they commemorate, or doctrine they are designed to maintain and teach.

I need not stop to specify at length as the facts fill our entire range of rational thought.

The temple worship was "The example and shadow of good things to come." Heb. viii. 5.

The baptism and Lord's supper service of our gospel age originated in the dispensational facts on which they rest. Baptism embodies the truth of Jesus, Baptism by "the baptizer," his burial in death and his resurrection, Rom. vi. 2–5.

The Lord's supper shows forth his death and his second coming to salvation. 1 Cor. xi. 23, 27; Heb. ix. 28.

But the present great question of headship finds its special authority in these few facts. The divine headship is given thus:

1. "The head of woman is the man; the head of the man is Christ; and the head of Christ is God—over all and blessed forever;" 1 Cor. xi. 3; Rom. ix. 5; John i. 1–14; Psa. xxx. 6–9; Gen. i. 2. "Christ is the head of the body, the church." 1 Cor. xii. 12; Col. i. 18; the head of the gospel system.

3. Moses was the head of the Mosaic age. Thus was "Moses read and preached." Acts xv. 21.

The modern "Babylon the Great" was "the mother of harlots," the head of all the family in "the apostasy." Rev. xvii. to xix.

Now, comparing Scripture with Scripture, on every principle of revelation or reason, "the man of sin," unfolded from "the mystery of iniquity," is the head, husband, emperor or correlative of that whorish mother and her apostate household!

"That great city" on seven hills was Rome that then (and has through our age) ruled the Gentile world. Rev. xvii. 18; Dan. ii. 31–45; vii. 7–25.

Youth's Column.

Might Have Been.

I might have been more patient—
Ah! would the angry word
Upon my lips had perished,
Unuttered and unheard!
Some heart would now be lighter
To-week its toilsome way;
Some life would be more cheerful,
More sunshiny today.

I might have been more kindly—
How trifling is the cost
Of simple deeds of goodness,
Whose power is never lost!
The golden moment vanished,
And never to return;
The glory of beckoning,
Too late, too late I learn!

I might have been more loving
To those who hold me dear;
What little deeds, neglected,
Had soothed their pathway here!
The hasty word or action
That pained a gentle heart,
Ah! will its mournful memory
From out our life depart!

"I might have been"—and burden
Of life's remorseful song,
Within the heart forever
Its haunting echoes throng.
Oh, youth, upon the threshold,
To this sweet lesson bow!
For deeds of love and kindness,
Life has one season—Now!

—Geo. Cooper, in Golden Days.

Be polite or courteous to everybody. True politeness is giving attention to little things, little acts of self denial, kindness and love, striving to make everybody happy. It is benevolence flowing from a noble, generous, pious heart. It is in a word, doing to others as we would that they should do to us.

Evil Communication.

If you put a piece of lead into a pocket full of shillings and sixpences, the lead has no intention of blackening its neighbors; but let them jingle together for a week, and then take them out, and you will find the silver pieces all black. So a bad man blackens the hearts of his neighbors without intending it. A rose as it stands in the garden on a fine summer day has no intention of doing any good, but it cannot help casting its fragrance in the air and tempting you, as you walk through the garden, to come and rejoice in it. My children, all your life long you will be doing others either good or evil, not only when you intend it, but when you do not intend it. It all depends on this—whether you are good or bad yourself.—New Song.

Wasn't Wanted There.

She was a little old woman, very plainly dressed in black bombazine that had seen much careful wear, and her bonnet was very old-fashioned, and people stared at her tottering up the aisle of the grand church, evidently bent on securing one of the best seats, for a great man preached on that day, and the house was filled with splendidly dressed people who had heard of the fame of the preacher, of his learning, his intellect, and goodness, and they wondered at the presumption of the old woman. She must have been in her dotage, for she picked out the pew of the richest and proudest member of the church and took a seat. The three ladies who were seated there beckoned to the sexton, who bent over the intruder and whispered something, but she was hard of hearing, and smiled a little withered smile, as she said gently,—

"Oh, I'm quite comfortable here, quite comfortable here."

"But you are not wanted here," said the sexton pompously. "There is not room. Come with me, my good woman; I will see that you have a seat."

"Not room!" said the old woman, looking at her sunken proportions and then at the fine ladies. "Why, I'm not crowded a bit. I rode ten miles to hear the sermon today, because—"

But the sexton took her by the arm, and shook her roughly in a polite, underhand way, and she took the hint. Her faded old eyes filled with tears, her chin quivered, but she rose meekly and left the pew. Turning quietly to the ladies, who were spreading their rich dresses over the spot she left vacant, she said gently, "I hope, my dears, there'll be room in heaven for us all."

Then she followed the pompous sexton to the rear of the church, where, in the last pew, she was seated between a threadbare girl and a shabby old man.

"She must be crazy," said one of the ladies in the pew which she had at first occupied. "What can an ignorant old woman like her want to hear Dr.—— preach for. She would not be able to understand a word he said."

"These people are so persistent. The idea of her forcing herself into our pew! Isn't that voluntary lovely? There's Dr.—— coming out of the vestry. Isn't he grand?"

"Splendid! What a stately man! You know he has promised to dine with us while he is here."

He was a commanding looking man, and as the organ stopped and he looked over the vast crowd of worshippers gathered in the great church, he seemed to scan every face. His hand was on the Bible, when suddenly he leaned over the reading desk, and beckoned to the sexton, who obsequiously mounted the steps to receive a mysterious message. And then the three ladies in the grand pew were electrified to see him take his way the whole length of the church, to return with the old woman, whom he placed in the front pew of all, its occupants making willing room for her. The great preacher looked at her with a smile of recognition, and then the service proceeded, and he preached a sermon which struck fire from every heart.

"Who was she?" asked the ladies who could not make room for her, as they passed the sexton at the door.

"The preacher's mother," replied that functionary, in an injured tone.

How few remember that "while man looketh on the outward appearance, the Lord looketh on the heart."

A Test of True Love.

True love is known from the false by its way of behaving habitually to those who are nearest to us. The true Divine love is known by our conduct to our relations. There is a spurious loving kindness which is full of attachment to a sect or a party, a church or a faction, full of sympathy for outsiders, full of respect and gentleness for people by whom it hopes to rise, full of demonstrative regard for strangers; but is hard, selfish, petulant, brutal, and unconsiderate at home; bland in the forum, but blunt and harsh at the fireside. In ecclesiastical phrase—you, sir, "love the brethren." But do you love your brothers? You, young man, converted seven years ago in a revival, you "love the saints." But how do you behave to your sisters, or your mother? You man, with a sanctimonious look, you feel a "concern for the welfare of Zion;" but how do you act toward your own wife? You, wife, who give out soup tickets to the poor, —what sort of a reception do you give at nights to your jaded husband? In a word, how do you treat your relations, those with whom you live? Does your love shine out there? That is the test. What are you to your parents? to your children? to your employers? to your servants? for service itself can be made delightful in an atmosphere of love. What we really are is seen best at home. Does your love take the form of trying to smooth the path of your constant companions? That, if it does—that alone is the genuine diamond. If not, all the rest of the jewellery in which your soul delights is silex and potash, mere brittle and perishable glass, such diamond stars as you may buy in east London for three shillings apiece in copper settings, sold to the ignorant as the "finest gold;" such as the Indian Rajah possessed, who came into the English court arrayed in what he imagined to be a boundless wealth of jewellery, but which turned out after all to be nothing but an imitation, packed in his trunks by his wicked courtiers in Hindostan.

Will you say, "Ah, but the people at my home are so common and so disagreeable, so uninteresting, and so unreasonable. It is impossible to be noble and heroic towards them!" Who asked you to be heroic? The question is, if you are treated unjustly how do you return it? Nothing reveals character more than the way in which men fall out and manage their quarrels. Some there are who quarrel like evil spirits, whom some small wrong or slight kindles into fury, or drives into long fits of sullenness and wrath. Others in their very differences show themselves like good angels who have had the misfortune to fall out. The moment of passion does not occasion forgetfulness of a lifetime of loving kindness. There is a large-hearted way of managing a difference, as when Paul and Barnabas had a sharp contention, who soon forgot it in an abiding affection which was utterably incapable of making a spiteful "remembrance of him every year." Now true love shines brightest near at hand—and it is a flame kindled at the very centre and heart of Deity. God dwells as a living flame in the souls of those who live peaceably at home. And they are the persons who, being one with the Eternal Love, will live for ever. All others, though they spring numberless as the grass, shall perish under the fiery breath of avenging justice. O, wicked man, thou shalt surely die!—Edward White.

TRUSDELL.—At her home near Scholls Ferry, Oregon, Sept. 11, 1887, Sister Ida Trusdell, daughter of Brother William, and step-daughter of Sister Maria Trusdell, aged 18 years.

Sister Ida had been afflicted with the dread destroyer consumption, for nearly a year, which finally caused her death. She had been instructed from early childhood in the gospel of the kingdom. She was immersed last spring; her health being too poor at that time for her to go to the river, a tank was made in which she was buried in baptism. Her faith was in him who said, "I am the resurrection and the life." The writer addressed a sympathising congregation of brethren and neighbors on the occasion of her funeral. May her bereaved friends and relatives hold firmly to that hope "concerning them which are asleep that they sorrow not as others which have no hope." W. I. SHARLS.

Address T. J. Whitesitt at Broadhead, Wis.

My God, how at thy feet to-night I bow,
Remembering my sins of every day,
Happy, though sad, to know, my child,
With head bent low, I sing thy praise.

I've climbed many a weary day;
Almost beyond thy power to call,
In the deep anguish of despair, I turned
From thee, my Lord, my life, my all.

But the promise that the sower reaping may,
The sounds of grief have ceased and hope
Each breeze that 'round my dwelling murmured,
Seemed freighted with the notes of love.

In wild despair at times I cried,
"My peace is gone, nor all but I repent:
I'm left to walk my desolate way
With every heartache, truly a tear."

And I wonder as I gaze in hopeful trust,
The light of faith almost meets mine,
The last faint throbbing of the heart
Shows nothing in the chasm of despair.

Then I turn my eyes, and lo! I see
Of broken vows, from Eastern lands;
Yet up to pardon fair and white,
Can the stain from such be lifted?

It told the story of wondrous birth
Of one who trod on the shore of Jordan;
Of answers to prayers of those
Who knew to God will all earth's woes.

I read with eyes by tears made dim,
And heart as contrite and wife its guilt,
There ended with the fatal words,
"Go, and thy sins no more will."

I prayed for pardon, and it came
A glow of love throughout my soul;
For faith to rest I stood, for I knew,
How dear bought the broken roll.

My way I walk, with's ways above,
A still, sweet voice does whisper to me,
"Behold no more, but ever hear,
Be I am with thee, dearest heart."

O hear me, dear Christian friends,
When e'er the world to entice,
Ye little know how oft your words
May try the soul, despairing fear.

Mrs. J. C. Cook.

The Coming Struggle With Romanism.

England's Protestantism has long been England's glory, and the direct cause of her unrivalled prosperity and peculiar pre-eminence among the nations of Europe. That Protestantism is now sustaining a double attack, from without and from within. Yet few seem alive to the danger. The late Lord Beaconsfield saw it clearly enough, however. "Your empire and your liberties are in danger at this moment," he said, "more than when Napoleon's army of observation was encamped at Boulogne." What would he have said had he lived to see the present position of affairs! Fifty years ago the eminent statesman, Sir Robert Peel, said, with remarkable foresight: "The day is not distant, and it may be very near, when we shall have to fight the battle of the Reformation over again." That day has come. It has found us unprepared, and as a result the battle has to some extent gone against us. More than three centuries of emancipation from the yoke of Rome—360 years of Bible light and liberty—had made us over-confident, led us to underestimate the power and influence of the deadliest foe, not only of the Gospel of God, but also of Protestant England. Britain's honorable distinction of being the leading witness among the nations for the truth of the Gospel and against the errors of Romanism had come to be lightly esteemed among us. Our fathers won this distinction through years of sore struggle and strife; they purchased it with their best blood, and prized it as men prize that which costs them dear. It had cost us nothing; we were born to do it; we knew not its value by contrast as they did. In the early part of this century the power of Rome was in these lands a thing of the past, and it seemed to be fast decaying even in other lands. The nation grew up among us that there was no need to fear any revival of that deadly upas-tree, which is the blight of all that is great and good, pure and prosperous. The light of true knowledge had for ever dispelled the dark fog of superstition, so it was supposed; mediæval tyrannies and exactions clouked under a pretence of religion could never again obtain a footing in these lands of light and liberty. We might deride and deride the pretensions and follies of Rome, but as to dreading her influence—no. She was too feeble to inspire fear, or even watchfulness. This was all a delusion, but we have been roughly deceived. The difficult and dangerous crisis through which England is now passing is the direct result of the course of action taken under this delusion, and God only knows what the ultimate consequence may be. A serpent may be scotched, yet not killed; it may retain life enough to hurt and befool, on its foe's fatal ground. The ground may be purged from a destructive weed, but the little remnants left behind may sprout and spread so as speedily to pervade the plot again. It has been thus with Romish influence in Protestant England.

Protestantism has not been destroyed, but it has been sorely wounded. Romanism has not been crushed, but it has been greatly strengthened. Protestantism has not been extirpated, but it has been largely undermined. Romanism has not been banished, but it has been largely admitted. Protestantism has not been overthrown, but it has been greatly weakened. Romanism has not been weakened, but it has been greatly strengthened. ### THE GOSPEL.

"And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." Gal. iii. 8.

According to the above statement, the gospel is a proposition to bless all nations. The conditions through which this blessing is to come is stated by the apostle in the next verse. "They which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham." Here then we have justification through faith for "All nations." Faith first, then justification, then the blessing. Thus we are at once that the blessing is conditional.

But faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God: so if, all nations are to be blessed, all must first be justified, and since justification follows faith, and faith comes by hearing the gospel, it follows, that all nations must hear the gospel.

Faith is of such a nature that its exercise is the result of individual effort, or in other words, a nation can have no faith as a nation, but the faith is purely the belief and trust, of the individual. So that the blessing contemplated in the gospel is not a wholesale affair, but wholly of a retail nature, and affects the nation only as the individuals which compose the nation receive the blessing.

Referring to the promise in Genesis where the apostle finds his proof, we see this idea clearly set forth. God does not say I will bless the nation that blesseth thee, and curse the nation that curseth thee, but he does say, "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee." The pronouns "them" and "him" are evidently used in an individual sense, and in the blessing of all nations God certainly excepted every individual who is not justified by the faith of the gospel.

There never has been in the past and possibly may never be in the future such a thing as a whole nation—every individual—being righteous, and so too a nation never was wholly wicked, for we read in Revelation that some "out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation" were among the redeemed, and shall reign on the earth. It is evident that the cursing comes to none but those who are disobedient, and the blessing comes only to those who are faithful and obedient. The whole system of pardon justification and redemption is projected upon the plan of individual merit or demerit, in harmony with, or contrary to an acknowledged standard. The gospel then comes to every individual for his acceptance or rejection. Jesus says, "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world (habitable) for a witness unto all nations." It is an individual gospel. It seeks the interest of the individual. Its promises offer an individual inheritance, an individual crown, and individual eternal life: and that this offer extends to each individual person of every nation of earth, whether past, present, or future is evident from the whole tenor of God's plan of salvation as well as the most direct and copious statements of the sacred Scriptures. Witness the statement of Paul at Athens upon this point. He says, "God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands; neither is worshiped with men's hands as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life and breath and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation; that they might seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us, for in him we live, and move and have our being." The time of a nation's existence is not only fixed but also the bounds of their habitation, and whoever reads the above statements of the apostle with care, must, it seems to us see that individual responsibility in every nation is clearly taught, and every man is called upon to repent and that too in view of the fact that God "Hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness."

If then individual responsibility is taught in the Bible, so too must individual opportunity. Responsibility can not accrue to the individual except through opportunity. When there is no law there can be no transgression. The gospel must bring the opportunity: while the rejection of the gospel and transgression of God's law brings responsibility and punishment. The opportunity of seeing the light is the point upon which men disagree. But John says, he "Was not that Light, but was sent to bear witness of that light that was the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Every man then will see that light, but whether he will walk in the light or not, is another question. The light only brings the offer of the blessing within man's reach, but obedience brings the blessing. This is evident from what Peter says to the people at the gate of the temple. "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, and in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." Here individual turning away from iniquity is made the condition of receiving the blessing promised to Abraham in the gospel.

The attention is here called to the fact that while the Scriptures teach a blessing to Abraham and to his seed, and being blessed with faithful Abraham, they also teach a blessing through Abraham and through his seed. The distinction is thus: those who are called out in this and past ages are Abraham's seed, and are heirs with Abraham and are blessed with Abraham. When that seed is complete—when the kingdom is set up through Abraham and through his seed, the blessing will come to all the nations of the earth in the ages to come. But the greater part of the nations who have lived in the past are now dead without ever having heard the gospel, without ever having had an opportunity of obtaining the blessing offered by the gospel. The plan therefore of blessing them must almost utterly fail unless they arise from the dead. Jesus says that this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations.

It is useless to say that the phrase, all nations, in the above language is limited to the living nations at the time the declaration was made, for many of those nations have already passed away, and others have taken their places, and yet the gospel is being preached, and will be preached until the end. If it is limited to the living nations where is the hope for any one outside of those nations? Equally disastrous is the view that the "All nations" means those who live during the millennium, for would it not exclude the nations of the days of the apostles and up to that time? This view is too limited. All the nations of the earth in the promise covers all the nations who have fallen beneath the curse. If there ever have existed any nations that were not affected by the curse, they may not be included in the scheme of redemption. The gospel and its agencies are the plan of redemption. To say that the nations—all the nations of the earth, are not reached by the gospel is only to say that God's plan is not adequate to the fulfilment of his promise, and that the means employed is not commensurate with the end to be reached. It is only saying in another way that Christ did not taste death for every man.

If I never have an opportunity of hearing the gospel—if I never have the opening room to write my name in the book of life, if the theme of redeeming love is never whispered in my ear, if I am consigned to the silent land without a ray from the bright and morning star, if the Sun of Righteousness never dawns upon me and the light of my life goes out in eternal night, tell me, oh! tell me, how Jesus tasted death for me. God's promise to Abraham reads, all the nations of the earth. Anything short of this is not the gospel.

This gospel is called the "gospel of the kingdom" because through the kingdom this work alone can be carried out. The establishment of the kingdom of God is not the end to be reached. It is only the means through which the end is to be reached; and that end is the blessing of all nations, upon conditions of obedience.

A Pleasant Trip and Visit. No. 3.

"Knowledge shall be increased," and this is true in more things than one; the knowledge however that makes wise unto salvation, is the knowledge most desirable, and wherever we see this spreading, there we are assured is a candle lighted which ought never to go out. But alas! in some places, where once a vigorous and growing gathering of truth lovers assembled there now is only found one or two. Some have been enticed by the vanities of this present evil world, some have gone to seek gold, and failed to find it. Some have mixed in the busy pursuits after the bread that perisheth, and in so doing have lost sight of the "Bread which is from heaven." Some have said "What profit is there in serving God," and have thus turned to the beggarly elements of the world, or as it were "To seek the bubble reputation if needs be at the cannon's mouth." But what is our joy or hope? are we called upon by anything human to lay our armor off? have we not enlisted for the war? Yea, be it for a day, a month, or for life!

Bro. S. A. Chaplin and I kept together until we parted at Fort Wayne, his expectations were to reach home early in the afternoon, mine were that I should not reach home for two or more weeks to come. Railway travel oft times becomes tiresome, yet there are some things which happen to break the monotony, and one thing occurred which did this:—We were not far from Fort Wayne when our ears caught the voices of two earnest talkers in the seat behind us. I turned round and saw they had each an open Bible, and the subject on which they were conversing, and like all good students of the Word should, were determining their differences of understanding thereby. The words "Kingdom," "Reign of Christ," "Yet future," etc., drew me out to offer a word or two, and I felt pleased that I could echo the thoughts of one (they were both Baptist preachers), and now and then an objection, or rather difficulty would present itself, and an explanation required; this was readily forth-coming from God's word! Thank God for his word; it is a lamp and a light, and there is no need of stumbling if we give head thereto; it is when we depart therefrom, and give attention to fables, and I do not care whether they be "Old wives," or such as come from the too much learning which has virtually turned the brains of men; I would not set a light value to the highest attainments in learning, but would rather be a "fool," as men count such as simply believe, than know all mysteries, and have all knowledge, and yet fail to know him, whom to know is life eternal.

Night brought me to the home that was of my beloved wife, Canton! I felt a strangeness entering this city, I never felt before. Years have come and gone since I first came here, and took a loving daughter from a loving home of Father and Mother Eshelman. My feeling of "strangeness" was sadness; for here when I last visited—three years ago, all were then living, since which the enemy has entered this home, as he has thousands of others, and has borne therefrom the dear old father, who only a few months ago resigned his life into the hand of a faithful Keeper, who knoweth his own, and is known by them. A good and faithful son and wife, with the dear good mother remain to battle for life, and we know not which may first be called, to lie down and sleep the sleep that knows no awaking until "The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Oh, glorious day, to all who await the coming of the King in his majesty and beauty! Lord hasten the time!

Only a few flowers are left, only a few more leaves to fall, only a little while at longest, and the shadows will be upon us! But for all this, what an inspiring hope is ours—"There is a morning dawn"—The Day Star is yet to arise, the sun of righteousness is yet to arise, and healing, not disease—is to be in his beams! Therefore, wait patiently as those who wait for the morning!

I was surprised to find Canton grown so greatly, had doubled its population in less than ten years; now said to have some twenty-four thousand souls, and not one of these immortal!! Here a great industry will soon be in working order. "The Hampden Watch Company." Elegant workshops are in course of erection now known as "Dunber Heights;" the city contributed many thousands of dollars to have this company locate here, and it is expected some fifteen hundred persons will find employment here. I could but think of the first man who invented the pendulum, and of the first maker of clocks; who, were he to rise from the dead and see this huge establishment, would indeed wonder. Concentration of forces, and monopoly, seems the order of the day; and it almost seems useless to hope for any other form of government and order this side the time when a King shall reign in righteousness. Many are the schemes of men, whereby an amelioration of existing conditions, in which the governments of earth place us, can be bettered upon; all sorts of "Reforms" are proposed, and the rising cry is—Give us a stable form of government! We are tired of this or that form! From one extreme to another they rush, and the latest form seems the Henry George movement—whose great point is to bring things to such a leveling, as shall secure to man his hard earned accumulations, and to cease taxing, for the support of government, such accumulations, putting all taxation on land. Here in New York, where the working man is indeed a power, this scheme seems to carry many minds favorably. We are indeed living in an age when unrest seems written on all things, and there seems none to guide! This being so, how important we who look not for schemes of men to prevail, but the incoming of the age which shall witness all this, and more too, under the benign administration of Jesus Christ, whose reign shall be as "showers that water the earth." When not a Henry George, nor a Father McGlynn shall hold the reigns of government, but those who shall be Princes in all the earth, with a King who shall not judge after the hearing of the ear, nor the sight of the eye, but in righteousness will he judge (rule) the world.

The "Golden age," for which men have sighed and cried, has more in it than unbelievers, of whatever stripe they may be, have objected to! There is an underlying truth in many, if not all, the mythical conjectures contained in fable; and they who have read these, will readily allow this! "Man never is, but always to be blessed," is an incentive to hope, and were it not that a well defined future of this earth, and all that doth it inhabit, were shown us in the Holy Scriptures, I think, with our history back of us, the outlook would indeed be a sad one!

Our visit at Salem, as we had every reason to expect, was every way satisfactory! an absence of three years had wrought great changes here; in the material character of the place, which was very marked, in the increase of the number of new dwellings, but also in the establishment of Water Works, a much needed public benefit and blessing! none know the advantages of a full supply of pure water so much as those whose wells have dried up consequent on the short supply of rain in these parts.

Another wonderful industry here, is the Salem Wire Nail Factory. I visited these works, and was indeed surprised to see how very extensive these were, and how many were employed. The words "No admittance" were over the door of entrance to where the nails are being made, and being myself of a timid and retiring nature, as all who know me will be ready to testify—it so disposed—it is questionable whether I had dared venture in, but being led by our honored Bro. John Barber, I was as bold as any dog would be, following his master!!

My arrival in Salem was on the Friday night, and the next day being Saturday, I sallied forth to see the city, and instead of finding it Salem, i. e., Peace, I found it Babel, or confusion; for the showman was on hand, and all the wonders of the sign boards and more too, were to be exhibited to the gaping crowd at 50 and 25 cents a head, and cheap at that, to those who have money to spend for such things, as for me, I can use my small change to better purposes! I thought it possible some here professing to love the Lord Jesus Christ, and the truths of the Abrahamic faith, as some call it, would probably witness the show. I know of none who did, and if not then more to their credit! not only as a matter of dollars, but a cleaner conscience when they came to lie down at night.

I was greatly pleased on seeing the church building which our brethren are putting up here, so well advanced. It stands at the fork of two roads, and fronts the city, it will easily hold two hundred persons, it is a frame building 30 by 46 and the whole of the inside woodwork is of red oak, and the workmanship is unexceptionable! The platform and desk was in course of construction when I was there, but judging from what is done, these will prove harmonious and satisfactory.

On Sunday the meeting was to be at Patmos, about seven miles from Salem; in company with Bro. John Barber, his wife and others assembled, at the house of sister Sallie Regal, we met to call to remembrance our Lord's death, and "preach the Word." We felt great freedom in presenting him who is the hope of his people, as the Monarch who "shall live," and to whom every knee shall bow. I could but say, in substance, to those present, why not bow now! if such bad not, and there were those present who knew the right, and yet the wrong pursued To such, "Now is the acceptable time, now is the day of salvation," delays are dangerous, and temptations of a crafty character surround us.

After meeting closed, I was kindly invited to visit with our Bro. and Sr. W. Townsend, who live some four miles from the place of meeting: of course I accepted the invitation; and am glad I did, as I saw more of the country, and enjoyed their company the balance of Sunday and part of Monday. The country about where Bro. T. lives is very pretty, and I was told it was exceedingly so in the spring and summer seasons, and I would not question the statement.

Having been born and "raised" in two large cities, and thus continually having my ears filled with the ever rolling noise of the same, it was a relief to enjoy the quiet and subdued surroundings here found.

God bless the dear ones at 'Salem,' 'Beswell' and elsewhere, who have set up their banner in Salem, and who purpose by the grace of God, to let their light shine before men! To all such I can only say—Be faithful to your trust, let your lives correspond to your confession of faith; be men and women such as your Lord shall command; though for his sake your names may be cast out as evil, by those who choose the darkness, to the rejection of the light when presented to them.

Having parted with those of like precious faith at Salem, it was in hope that some other time my steps may be directed here, and a renewal of loving friendships may again occur.

What is Truth?

It is in language "open, frank, honest,"—a fair, candid statement of a case, with nothing concealed, kept back or covered up. It embraces facts and realities of any matter and lays them open to view. Like Apocalypse, aletheia, truth is the uncovering, the laying open, making known what has been concealed. It is from God revelation. It is with us an inquiry answered plainly with knowledge.

The mind is constituted to crave and delight in truth—in the facts and realities of all subjects, as no one likes to be deceived or misled.

The grand question of all ages before Pilate concerned the Jews and Gentiles as to a Savior, or impostor—salvation or destruction. It centered in the fact that Jesus was the Son and heir to David's throne and all embraced in that fact. Hence this was the truth of God's word—the good confession before Pontius Pilate, as required by prophecy concerning the Jews and Jerusalem; the resurrection and his sending the Holy Spirit for this age of gospel calling, and the revolutions of the Roman,—Pagan and Papal—Gentile world—his coming and kingdom.

The full answer to our question of truth involves the Bible and comprehends the creation; Gen. i. 26–30; and man; Ps. cxv. 16–16; their disorder and restoration, Acts iii. 21; Rom. viii. 19, 26.

Note I. The demonstration of this lies in the facts and realities of the universe, as given in the record of creation; Gen. i. 6, 7. The earth and its order of "day and night,—seedtime and harvest—summer and winter,—cold and heat!" The earth and sea bringing forth abundantly. The division of time into seven days—as weeks—The reign of sin unto death as it takes in our race,—The recognition of God and some form of religion with sacrifice,—all had a common origin in reference to mercy. Hence Noah's sons knew God, but "became vain in their imaginations and changed the truth into a lie, and worshiped the thing made rather than the maker! Rom. i. 18–25; Isa. xlv. 20; Jer. x. 14.

Thus the origin of the earth's order of its seasons—the good with the evil,—is unveiled, laid open, apocalypsed God's word gives the truth. The facts and realities of earth and man are monumental—they exist to sustain and justify the record.

II. We have more than the past origin of earth and its heavens, and ages; introduced by John, the Baptist, the birth and life of Jesus—his "one offering once for all"—his resurrection from the dead, his gift of the spirit of God,—his entrance not into the Holy place made with hands, the figures of the true, but into heaven itself, there to appear for us,—and to come "the second time to salvation, restitution" all new covenant blessings in the life everlasting.

III. We have the germs of language and of the great nations, their geography and history, from Nimrod (Bel, Belus, Baal) the grandson of Noah through Nebuchadnezzar to Napoleon.

These names and events from the Babel builders of Babylonia became monumental, and so far perpetual. From Nebuchadnezzar and Babylon they descend to Cyrus the Persian, thence to Alexander the Macedonian, and Cæsar Augustus the Roman. Thence his imperial and Papal successors to the French Revolution and our present generation.

As the four seasons fill out the circuit of each year so the four great empires will complete the times of the Gentiles in governing the world.

These four have been contemporary with the great Patriarch of Israel and Judah, during the Mosaic and Christian ages! The truth and people and cause of God trodden down by them will be emancipated at the second coming of Christ and his kingdom; the prayer, "thy kingdom come" will be answered! The whole earth will be Paradise restored and all again good, and that forever, Amen!

IV. Teaching and preaching generally have no origin, outline or end; except as isolated, incidental parts of what belongs to God's grand whole purpose. It is to show to angels, principalities and powers in heavenly places, his manifold wisdom and love, Eph. iii. 11–21.

Thus he will bring and bind Jew and Gentile, men and angels into bonds of all blessing under the new and everlasting covenant.

The freedom of Man's responsible nature demands government and hence come reward and penalty—In parable it is as wheat and chaff. The wheat is garnered, the chaff consumed. All governments must exert this prerogative to rid itself of obstacles.

There has been much research to get at "the sign of the Son of Man in heaven. My mind and heart have waited here as at all other points in this profound subject of "the Second Advent of Christ." Now, on my knees in earnest prayer, and with no preposession or thought that way, the fact of "the Star of Bethlehem" was suggested as this sign.

At the first advent this was the sign. Not what has been confectured, but what was fore told. A star was announced. Num. xxiv. Hence a star came that moved the wise men and Herod the King and all Jerusalem. Here is fact and it was the basis of a great public awakening.

Editor Restitution:

I want to tell you that, by the grace of God, I am still living and working here, and thanks to him, not without fruit.

I receive THE RESTITUTION and want also to thank you for your kindness in sending it to me. I find sometimes there some items fit for being reproduced in our monthly magazine, The Biblical Bee.

I see in the last No. (Sept. 14th) the groups of books at low prices. As I want to have the Emphatic Diaglott, the Smith's Bible Dictionary and the Cruden's Concordance, I would like to know if you could make a special group of these three, and at what price? Or better, if among your friends, some liberal souls were disposed to help the Italian work in that way, i. e., in sending me those books, they would be very useful.

To speak the truth, my salary is so little that I cannot spend much in books, so that a help of that sort is of a double value.

Please, meantime, to send me a copy of Thenatopsis.

Our work in Italy goes on and makes its way in despite of all the obstacles, which are neither little nor few.

We find the truth is more acceptable among Catholics than among Protestant people.

We observe that it shows its power even over its adversaries who are obliged to acknowledge certain facts which are contrary to their beliefs.

We anticipate the day when the enemies will say, "Well we always have believed like you." But it will not be true faith, and Christianity will die in infidelity and apostacy.

Besides my local work here, I go sometimes to deliver some lectures in some Italian city. I went several times to Milan. I hope soon to be able to visit Genoa.

The Lord bless you and your brethren. Please remember us in your prayers. Accept my best regards and cordial wishes in the love of Jesus.

STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING.

The Annual meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, will be held at Plymouth, Ind., on Saturday, Nov. 12, 1887, for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors, and for the transaction of such business as may come before the meeting.

BY ORDER OF THE BOARD.

PRESENT appearances strongly indicate that nothing will be done by the Supreme Court of the United States to prevent the execution of the condemned anarchists in Chicago on Nov. 11, according to the sentence of the Illinois Supreme Court. It is exceedingly doubtful that a writ of error will be granted. Probably the question will be settled Thursday, Oct. 27. Should the writ not be granted, the fate of these men is decided beyond all hope from any court. It is not at all likely that the Governor will interfere.

FROM Mr. Charles F. Mills, Secretary of the Illinois Board of Agriculture, we have the announcement of the Annual Horse and Cattle Show, to be held in the Chicago Exposition Building, Nov. 8-18. Reduced fare on all railroads centering in Chicago during the continuance of these shows. The exhibition of cattle, horses, poultry, and dairy products will render it of particular interest to farmers and stock raisers. Thanks for complimentary card of admittance.

For Gospel Ministers.

A metropolitan preacher of high and deserved fame, and of more than thirty years' experience of the difficulties and successes of ministerial work said, not long since, in answer to an indirect compliment on his preaching ability, "I really don't think I know how to preach yet. I am trying all I can to succeed in getting a perfect mastery of the divine art, and I hope I shall succeed after awhile; but at present I am a long way off my ideal." In that statement of the gray-haired veteran, voice is given to the inmost soul of every true preacher of the gospel of Christ. In his convictions, in his self-depreciation, and in his hopes, if not in his success, he represents every minister whose lofty aims and enlarging conceptions of the superhuman greatness and grandeur of his task fill every day with works of self-discipline, touch with transforming magic the entire field of life, and arouse to unequaled industry every power of his redeemed and renewed nature. Till the volume of life is closed, we must follow on so that we may apprehend that for which we were apprehended by Jesus.

But you are at the threshold of your career. Your indentures are but recently drawn out. You stand at the golden door of opportunity and hope. This is your formative period in a superlative degree, and on your initial acts infinite issues hang. "Well begun is half done." Sow bad seed to-day, and a harvest of weariness and misery will meet you as the new century dawns. Know your work now, and do it with the strength of Christ-redeemed and Christ-called men, and your reward will be exceeding great in the opening heavens of futurity.

You cannot make an effective preacher, faithful shepherd of souls, out of a mean, hard, little, self-conceited, self-centered man. The finest training ever known would as easily get blood out of a stone as make an able minister of the New Testament out of the thinnest "fribble" of human biped. "Apprentices" must have some manly fiber in them if the skill of tutors and governors is not to be used in vain.

Some men, like Paul, are "born out of due time," and have much to overcome before they become "all things to all men;" but he who is made man worthy here (for man," a living, loving, growing man; a man with soul in every part of him; broad and tender in his sympathies; able to enter into and live with all sorts and conditions of men; sensitive to the sorrows of the poor and the woes of the wretched; able to bear gently with the ignorant and erring, "for that he himself is also compassed with infirmity;" with a genius for brave self-denial, knightly chivalry, sustained by overwhelming conceptions of the vastness of life and the grievousness of its issues; large in faith, soaring in aspiration, strong in will, rich in patience, and glowing in the love of God and souls. Ordinary Christians—I say it full well knowing the loftiness of the claim I make, but assured of the truth of my assertion—ordinary Christians are not the stuff to make preachers of, any more than ordinary and commonplace politicians are fitted to lead you in legislation, or ordinary soldiers to marshal your armies, or ordinary painters to fill your Royal Academy, or ordinary letter-writers to edit your newspapers. The ministry demands men with a genius for religion, i. e., self-denial, abandon, enthusiasm, severe self-discipline, exulting, venturesomeness, faith, self-control, joy, and God; as other men have a genius for song, or for building, or for money-making. A man whose nature is lucrarily mean, who is capable of petty prejudices and little resentments, who flares into anger at trifles, should take that as the sign that he is not intended to minister magnanimity, love, goodness, and joy to others. These things cannot get through him. He is the bog that absorbs all heaven's moisture; not the clear-cut channel that distributes it. He wants soul, kingly will, splendid self-sacrifice, abandonment, the championship of exalted ideals; let him stick to his yard measure and column-making, or a good business may be lost without a preacher being secured. He may drive an engine; he will not build up souls. He might even become a dissector or a defender of creeds, a classifier of opinions, a systematic theologian, or he might preside at an inquisition; but a loving, heart-moving preacher, never! It is soul that lifts soul.

Christ's apostles were not ordinary men. He spent the whole night in prayer to his Father before he chose them from the wider ranks of his disciples, and it was in the most perfect wisdom that he lifted them to the positions of messengers and witnesses for him. They were the very best that could be found in the circle of disciples; most devout in spirit, eager in expectation, fresh in feeling, open-eyed in inquiry, and bold in deed. "It is no inattentive idlers hanging on the skirts of the group that he thinks good enough to go and carry his message." They had qualities that gave promise of expansion, service, fidelity, leadership, patience, heroism, and victory; and therefore he chose them from the rest, bade them follow him, and devoted many months of sacred companionship to make them "fishers of men!" God forgive us that we have so sorely forgotten the meaning of that divine election, and imagined that any sort of Christian would suffice to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ.

Young men, seek first greatness of soul! Get up above and beyond all littleness! See the dignity of your work, and covet earnestly magnanimity, total freedom from pettishness, vanity, conceit, subtle self-pushing, and all weak and unmanly ways. Recall the image of that fine and noble spirit in a poor and ignoble time, young Milton, and imitate his wise choice, firm will, and patient consecration. It was his calling to be the poet for God, and he accepted it as Isaiah the burden of prophecy, Jeremiah the mandate to rebuke Israel, and Savonarola the vocation of preaching repentance to the Florentines.—Dr. J. Clifford, LL. B.

Replenish—Fill.

It is now a trite remark that the translators of the Authorized English Version of the Bible seem to have regarded it as a principle that as great a variety of rendering as possible should be given to the same Greek or Hebrew term, even in the same context. As an example of this we select Gen. i. 28, 38. In verse 38 the same word malah is rendered replenish, which in verse 22 is rendered fill simply. We may, indeed, reasonably believe that the translators meant no more than fill completely, stock abundantly. Such is the sense given to replenish and to replenished in Johnson's Dictionary, edition 1760. Milton and Bacon being cited as authorities. Compare, replete and repletion; full, completely filled, the state of being overfull. Bacon. But the use of two translations of the same word in such close proximity is misleading, and so we find some translators, both in the Common Version and in the Revised, use the word "replenish" in Gen. i. 22, that the earth must have been filled with men at some period anterior to the "six days' creation."—Elpis Israel, 1st edition, p. 50. The basis, however, does not sustain the theory. The Hebrew term is correctly rendered fill in verse 22 ("fill the waters in the seas"), and should have been so rendered in verse 28; and is so rendered in Dr. Young's translation. It has been well remarked by a thoughtful and well educated writer that "it must be emphatically stated that no argument in favor of 'filling again' can be built on the verse by enlightened and conscientious people. If the 'filling' was actually 'a filling again,' the fact must be established from other testimonies."

It has been argued by some who hold the theory of Pre-Adamite man, and seek to support it by the authorized version translation of Gen. i. 28, that in Gen. ix. 1 the context favors the rendering replenish, or fill again. "And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be faithful, and multiply, and replenish the earth." It is beyond question that the filling of the earth by Noah and his sons would be a re-filling of it, since the narrative informs us that, except those who were saved in the ark, all the descendants of Adam had perished in the flood; but this could not have been learned from the word mal-A itself, and to argue as the writer of Elpis Israel has done, that, because in Gen. ix. 1, the word in question practically means to fill again, therefore it is allowable to infer that it means fill again in Gen. i. 28, is altogether unsound. There is no information in the sacred narrative that the earth had been peopled before it was, as described in Gen. i. 2.

Malah as a verb occurs upwards of 250 times in the O. T. Six times the A. V. renders it replenish, or replenished, viz.:—Gen. i. 28; ix. 1; Isa. ii. 6; Jer. xxxi. 25; Ezek. xxvi. 2; xxvii. 25. Five times have the O. T. Revisers followed the A. V., i. e., in all the instances named, except Isa. ii. 6. By referring to these passages, it will be found that the ordinary lexicon definition—fill, filled—agrees with the sense of the context, without the slightest strain. In Young's translation fill, filled, is the rendering given in all these instances.

Gesenius renders the verb malah, "1 Trans. fill, to make full. The primary idea seems to be that of abundance, overflow. 2. Intrans. to be filled, to be full." Upwards of 100 examples are given, Gen. i. 28; ix. 1, amongst the rest. This is true also of the use of the word as an adj., as malu, and an adv. In the Hebrew Scriptures the word has a wide and varied application; as to fill the waters with fish, the earth, or a country with inhabitants, to fill a cup, or measure, to fill one's days, etc., but never to express the idea of filling again.

I have been thus particular with this matter because it is common to hear certain parties prate about Pre-Adamite man; and it is well that we should be able to tell them that they must seek their evidence elsewhere than in the book of Genesis.—W. Leask, in Messenger.

Our Lord's Prophecy.

"As the days of Noe were, so shall the coming of the Son of Man be, for as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot, they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed. In that day, he which shall be upon the house-top, and his stuff in the house, let him not come down to take it away; and he that is in the field, let him likewise not return back. Remember Lot's wife. Whosoever shall seek to save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life shall preserve it. I tell you, In that night there shall be two men in one bed; the one shall be taken, the other shall be left. Two women shall be grinding together; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two men shall be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. And they answered and said unto him, Where Lord? And he said unto them, Wheresoever the body is thither will the eagles be gathered together." Matt. xxiv 37, 38; Luke xvii. 26-37.

We may here regard "eating and drinking," marrying and giving in marriage, as standing generally for the indulgence of the body. This, if it be the great pleasure of our lives, may prove fatal to us though we never step over the line of worldly morality and propriety. Absorption of business and commerce, that most prominent characteristic of modern times, is indicated by "buying and selling." And in "building, and planting," we discern the use to which wealth is usually applied, that is, for comfortable settlement in the doomed world.

Now the exclusive, or too eager pursuit of these things deprives men of all spiritual perception; so that they laugh at the threats of God, until the very moment of judgment has arrived. And yet even believers cannot avoid more or less entanglement in the actions mentioned, which are not, of course, necessarily sinful. The latter must, therefore, watch and pray, lest, becoming absorbed in that which is earthly, they should be surprised by the coming of the Son of Man, and so should be left by him to endure the hour of temptation with the world.

For Christ will, at his Advent, pass as lightning round the whole globe, summoning all those who profess his name to leave home and kindred and ascend to him. And whosoever loves him better than aught besides, and really wishes to obey, will prove able to do so, even as the impotent man, when he made an effort to respond to the Lord's command, "Arise," found that the power to rise and walk was present with him. But he who hesitates, remembering something which he must first do, or turning in his heart any object of love other than Christ, will have lost his opportunity.

"In that day," continues the Lord, "he which shall be on the housetop, and his goods in the house, let him not go down to take them away; and let him that is in the fields likewise not return back." At that instance, he that is on the housetop must have no thought of precious things within the house, but must stand where he is, ready to be caught into the presence of Christ. Not that there will be any time for actual motion before the King has gone by with his train, and the awful moment has passed; it is but the inclination of the heart one way or the other that will decide the matter. The attractive power which will proceed from the Lord during his progress, will be sufficient to draw to him only those who are not weighted with earthward desires.

So, again, he that is in the field must not seek to return back. He may have father and mother, brothers and sisters, wife and little ones, at home; but not a thought must be bestow upon them when the sudden summons comes. Up to that time it is his duty to think and care for them; the law written for him is: "If any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel," 1 Tim. v. 8 But the instant he becomes conscious that the Lord is come the duties of this life are ended. His love for his Creator, Savior, and King must overpower all other love; and his trust must so abound that he can at once resign even his dearest ones to the Almighty and tender care of him into whose presence he has been called.

Such must be the condition of every believer who would be able to respond to the Master's voice. But there are some who, remembering th the summons will come suddenly, and that literally no more than an instant will be given for its acceptance, may be disposed to fall into dispondency, "How," they say, "can we prepare ourselves for such a time; how can we always be watching?" God by his own love and power has justified us, and by that same love and power he must sanctify us. On our side it is required that with purpose of heart, and not merely in sentiment, we put ourselves into his hands, being willing that he should do with us whatsoever he sees to be necessary.

To us the command is given: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembled; for it is God which worketh in you, both to will and to do, of his good pleasure," Phil. ii. 12, 13. Of him, then, is our preparation, just as from him the very desire for it comes into our hearts. And as soon as we recognize this fact, all our perplexities vanish, and there is no longer any ground for despair. For it is his touch that transmutes all things to gold; it is he who chooses the base things of the earth to make them honorable, who "raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory," 1 Sam. ii. 7.

Let us, then, if doubts oppress us, cast the burden of them upon him, and remember the prayer of Paul for the Thessalonians in regard to the very point which is now before us. For after the Apostle has urged them to walk worthily of their vocation, he closes his address with the pregnant words: "And the God of peace himself sanctify you wholly, and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you, who will also do it," 1 Thess. v. 23.

As the lightning of Christ's Advent speeds through the night, husband and wife may be reposing on the same bed; the one is borne away, and the other is left to weep alone on the dark earth. Two women may be employed together in some ordinary work, such as the Eastern duty of grinding corn, for the day's food, in the early morning; in an instant the one is removed in a flood of glory, while her companion must labor on in bitterest grief. Two men may be tilling the ground in the heat of the day: a sudden flash far exceeds the brightness of the sun; and when it has passed, there remains but a solitary figure in the field.—G. H. Pember, in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

His Greatest Thought.

At a dinner at the Astor House, when Daniel Webster was the Secretary of State under President Fillmore, after a period of silence which fell upon the company of some twenty gentlemen who were present, one of the guests said:

"Mr. Webster, will you tell me what was the most important thought that ever occupied your mind?"

Mr. Webster slowly passed his hand over his forehead, and in a low tone enquired of one near him:

"Is there any one here who does not know me?"

"No; all are your friends."

"The most important thought that ever occupied my mind," said Mr. Webster, "was that of my individual responsibility to God." And after speaking on this subject in the most solemn strain for some twenty minutes, he silently rose from the table and retired to his room.

This incident, related by Harvey in his Reminiscences, serves to illustrate the attitude of great minds towards eternal things. Great men are not scoffers. The men of flippant sneers and godless jests are men of small caliber and shallow intellect. It is not the wise man who has "said in his heart there is no God." It is not the great man who casts off fear and restrains prayer before him.

A great man comprehends something greater than himself, for he is but the image of a divine Creator, marred, defaced and distorted by sin, yet bearing testimony to the dignity and grandeur of the divine original, whose glory is so faintly shadowed in the man whom he has made, and endowed with intellect and will and conscience, and whom he has made to feel, in the depths of his soul, the importance of "individual responsibility to God."

Rome's Saloons and Our Public Schools.

The Catholic Review arraigns the public school system as the chief cause of the degeneracy of morals in our republic. It makes a needless journey round Robin Hood's barn in search of a cause, when the true and sufficient one may be found in its own constituency. Simple facts are fatal to its theory. The vast majority of criminals in our jails and penitentiaries have been innocent of all contact with the school-room. They come from the Catholic Churches of Europe, where no priestly care has trained them to true religion or pure morals. If Roman cathedrals and confessionals will reclaim vicious Catholics, and the European scum that floats to our shores, the public schools will take good care of our own people. It is a curious logic for the Catholic press to hold our schools responsible for the failures of their own priesthood.

But we must give some of the Catholic clergy credit for an honest attempt to reform their parishioners. We called attention recently to Father Byrne's pungent rebukes in Boston. His told plain truths, when he said that Irish Catholics are the keepers and patrons of the worst saloons in the city. Worcester priests have been imitating his example in a more personal way. They have told from the pulpit the exact number of their own parishioners who are keepers of the saloons, and it appears that most of the saloons are in charge of regular members of Catholic parishes. Does The Catholic Review imagine that these saloon-keepers owe their degenerate habits to the training of the public schools?

The friends of the public schools will be more seriously alarmed at the growing illiteracy in New England, incident to foreign immigration. It is an appalling fact, that the number in Massachusetts who can neither read nor write has increased in five years from 94,000 to 125,000. The banner State of the Union is sinking towards the level of South Carolina and Arkansas. Compulsory education seems to fail of reaching the children of foreigners, and bringing them into the public schools; and it is not surprising that degeneracy in morals keeps pace with social ignorance.—Prof. Herman Lincoln, in Morning Star.

THE PAPACY AND THE MAN OF SIN NOT IDENTICAL.—No. 8.

But Dr. Gordon, to justify the Holy Ghost, as he thinks, calling that the temple of God which has become apostate, refers to Christ as calling the Laodiceans whom he spues out of his mouth "the church of Laodiceans." To this we reply, the Holy Ghost never does call an apostate church the temple of God. It is the saints, the elect race, that he calls the temple of God. And Dr. Gordon's reference to the church of Laodiceans shows up, further, the utter weakness of his cause; it has no point in it. It would be enough simply to reply that the church of Laodiceans is not the church that the Holy Ghost calls the temple of God. But in Scripture there are many instances in which the term, churches, is used, referring to religious assemblies in different localities in which may be sometimes unworthy persons. Hence we read of the churches of Galatia, the churches of Macedonia, and the seven churches in Asia. Now Dr. Gordon knows that it is the faithful ones, the elect of God, scattered in all the churches, in all nations, that form the true church, the church that is called the temple of God in the New Testament; and just as well does Dr. Gordon know that in this holy temple the man of sin has never dwelt, but the Holy Ghost. It is simply amazing what absurd and inconsistent things men will say to hold up a theory to which they have once committed themselves.

The phrase, then, the temple of God, in which the antichrist, the man of sin, shall sit, setting himself forth as God, can refer to no other temple than that which will yet be built in Jerusalem.

Now it is a very significant fact—a fact that can be well sustained by history—that this theory of the Papacy being the antichrist, or the man of sin, is comparatively of late origin. It does not harmonize with the view held by the Christian fathers, and dates about a thousand years later than the time of Christ. Numerous quotations could be adduced, from various ones among the fathers, to show that it was the general belief among them that the antichrist would be a man, "an individual person, the incarnation and concentration of sin," and that this prediction relates to the future. This view continued to prevail in the church till the eleventh century, when the church, already at the head of the civil power, and asserting a pre-eminence which did not rightfully belong to her, caused some to conclude that Paul's words referred to the Papal hierarchy. "This view," says Dean Allord, "first appears in the conflict between the emperors and the Popes, as held by the partisans of the imperial power, but soon becomes that of all those who were opponents of the hierarchy, as wishing for a freer spirit in Christendom than the ecclesiastical power allowed. It was held by the Waldenses, the Albigenses, the followers of Wickliffe and Huss.... Thus towards the time of the Reformation, this reference of Antichrist to the Papal hierarchy became very prevalent; and after that event it assumed almost the position of a dogma in the Protestant Churches. It is found in almost all the foreign reformers, and many subsequent commentators; in the symbolical books of the Lutheran Church, and in Luther's own writings; and runs through the works of our English Reformers."

Prevalent, then, as this view is now, it must ever be kept in mind how it originated. A very different view to this was the one entertained by the Christian Fathers; they held the same, substantially, as we hold; they held that the antichrist, the man of sin, would be a man, not a succession of men, nor a system, but a person, who should rise up near the end of the age, and have power given to him by Satan to oppose the Christ and persecute the saints: and they who lived in the most primitive and purest times, and came nearest to the influence of apostolic teaching, were most likely to get the true sense of that teaching. And it is a notorious fact that in the centuries following the union of the church with the state, both doctrine and practice became greatly corrupted. But the fact that the theory does not agree with Scripture, is fatal to it. We do not deny that there are points of resemblance. Some things predicted seem to have their fulfilment in the Papacy; but it should be remembered that the characteristics should be complete; there should be no discrepancies such as we see, no difficulties which involve absurdities, inconsistencies, and plain opposition to facts. It is not thus that Jehovah fulfils what he has foretold shall most surely come to pass.

But on another phase of this subject we have numerous writers who are mixing up things that differ. Some whom we know, and who in learning are greatly our superiors, confound the Papacy, and the great harlot, and the man of sin, or the little horn, or the beast together. And the beast and the harlot, it is taught, come to their end at the same time at the fiery judgment. Yet the great harlot, it is clearly taught in Rev. xvii. 16, is destroyed by the little horn, or the beast and the ten kings, ere he is himself destroyed. How then can the beast and the harlot be the Papacy? The beast cannot be that which he destroys. The beast, or the last head that governs it, that governs this fourth great world-power, is the antichrist; but the Papacy, we are told, is the antichrist; and the woman, or harlot, it is insisted, is the Papacy. But if the woman is the Papacy, and the little horn, or the head of this beast, destroys her, how can the little horn be the Papacy? Daniel's little horn of chapter vii., is in active operation when the Lord comes in judgment, and it is by divine judgment that he is overcome and destroyed: not so the woman, as any one may see from Rev. xvii. 16. In the face of this inspired distinction between the little horn, or the beast, and the mother of harlots, writers should not confound them together.

Satan, in order that the world may be the more fully ensnared, in order that the number may be as small as possible who shall be apprised of the real character and of the terrible doings of the antichrist, has persuaded multitudes of even good men to turn their attention to the Papacy as having fulfilled the peculiar traits of the antichrist. He has been a deceiver from the beginning, and he is now deceiving men with regard to the things that are foretold shall come to pass in the time of the end. He thus seeks to frustrate the very design of prophecy. And in thousands of cases he succeeds. He has succeeded in persuading tens of thousands that the great tribulation is past, that the unparalled day of trouble has gone by, and that there is now in store for the world a bright and glorious future towards which it is constantly approaching, and which any hour may burst upon us, the reign and wicked career and presuming power of the antichrist being now a matter of history. Can anyone give us the present address of any of the following persons. They have left their old homes, and gone away leaving their accounts with us unsettled, and we wish their addresses that we may place the accounts in the hands of a collector for settlement.

We have waited on these and some others, until they have, by their conduct, all but proved false, and if we can find any one or all of them we will try and find out why they do not pay.

OH, FOR A PERFECT TRUST!

Isa. xxi. 3; Phil. iv. 6, 7.

Oh! for the peace of a perfect trust,
My loving God, to thee;
Unwavering faith, that never doubts
Thou choosest best for me.

Best, though my plans be all upset;
Best, though the way be rough;
Best, though my earthly store be scant:
In this I have enough.

Best, though my health and strength be gone,
Though weary days be mine,
Shut out from much that others have;
Not my will, Lord, but thine!

And even though disappointments come,
They too are best for me,
To wean me from this changing world,
And lead me nearer thee.

Oh! for the peace of a perfect trust
That looks away from all;
That sees thy hand in everything,
In great events or small;

That hears thy voice—a Father's voice—
Directing for the best:—
Oh! for the peace of a perfect trust,
A heart with thee at rest!

JOY COMETH.

"Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

Out of the weary shades of night,
Out of the darkness comes the light;
In fearful doubt or midnight storm,
Courage and hope of faith are born.

From mountain height the trumpet rings
Earth's hope beneath death's angel wings,
But lo! there shines the "morning star,"
Gleaming in glory from afar.

Beyond the storm king's mantling shroud,
God's signet ring upon the cloud,
Pledges his love and truth and light,
When faith herself is lost in sight.

Saving Faith.

The salvation revealed in the Scriptures is not made known elsewhere. It is to them we are indebted for all reliable information upon the subject. At no stage of the world's mental development have its foremost thinkers managed to hit upon an analogous scheme. To the Oracles of God, therefore, we turn for the one true solution of the problem, which meets us at the earliest dawn of reason. In them alone do we read of a salvation that answers to our deepest needs. It is therein connected with, and made conditional upon, a certain attitude of the mind which is described by the word faith. The house of Israel are spoken of in Deut. xxxii. 20 as "children in whom is no faith." This accusation is borne out in the epistle to the Hebrews, iv. 2, where is a reference to those who fell in the wilderness, of whom it is said, "The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." In the same epistle, xi. 6, it is broadly stated that "without faith it is impossible to please God." This being the case, it is clearly of the utmost consequence that we be well informed as to the nature of faith, what it rests upon, how it is produced and sustained, and what it will end in. Now, what is the demand here made upon us? Is it a blind and unquestioning acceptance of certain propositions without regard to their coherence or probability, or reasonableness? That would be mere credulity, not faith. God does not ask us to close our eyes. It is the well-known contention of Papacy that reason steps out of its proper province the moment it employs itself on matters of religion. There is, of course, no imaginable absurdity that might not be defended on such grounds. But the Scriptures invite us to a reasonable service. The wisest man of history applied his heart, "to know, and search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things."

It is the peculiar province of faith to deal with the future. In this respect it may be said to differ from belief. The latter is concerned with what is past, with the things God has already done upon the earth. He has chosen the nation of Israel, dispersed them among the Gentiles, and promised of old to restore them to their land, and place them under the care of a king and shepherd of their own. He has raised his Son Jesus Christ from the dead in view of this, and has committed to him the jurisdiction of the whole earth. It is quite possible for a man to believe all this who is but imperfectly acquainted with all the evidence that goes to prove it. For it is not like an abstruse literary question, requiring for its settlement an extensive acquaintance with books. No erudition is needed to enable a man to know and understand the promises of God, which are the foundation of saving faith. He has simply to turn up his English Bible and search those promises out. There they are, couched in no ambiguous terms; and not all the ministers and clergymen in the world could make them one whit plainer. The only mistake he is in danger of is in supposing that they mean something other than that which is warranted by the simple, grammatical import of the terms in which they are expressed.

What was it on which rested the faith of God's saints in ancient times? Surely there ought to be no great difficulty in answering a simple question like that. "Abraham believed God and it was counted unto him for righteousness. . . . They which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham." Gal. iii. 6–9. In order thus to share the blessing of Abraham, we must have his faith, and this we cannot have unless we know and believe what was promised him. It is unfortunately the case that much of the faith of which we hear in religious circles, is in no way founded upon any promise which God made to Abraham. If you were to examine all the definitions of saving faith contained in theological literature, you would not find a sentence referring you to any covenant which God made to Abraham, the progenitor of the Israelitish nation. And it is by no means clear how those can be said to be "blessed with faithful Abraham" who do not believe what God told him, or who are ignorant upon the point. His faith was no hazy, nebulous impression that, somehow or other, all would come right in the end. It was the belief of specific testimony. "The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the nations through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." Gal. iii. 5

If our faith is to be of any advantage to us, must it not rest on that ancient foundation? "He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; being fully persuaded that what he had promised, he was able to perform." Rom. iv. 20, 21. We certainly can have no simpler or more Scriptural definition of saving faith. What bishop could give us a better, or one easier to understand? A full persuasion that God will do what he has said—a persuasion based upon his own promises. This is that which constituted Abraham "the father of all them that believe," Rom. iv. 11, an honorable distinction truly! Righteousness is to be imputed to all who walk in the steps of his faith. They are just required to believe what he believed, and to look for the things which were objects of faith and hope to him. Then comes the question, What sort of a promise did God make to Abraham? For, whatever it was, Paul regarded it as lying at the very foundation of the gospel which he preached. He declared that he was "judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers." Acts xxvi. 6. He says also that "Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God to confirm the promises made unto the fathers." Rom. xv. 8. Thus it is abundantly manifest that the very gospel itself, which we are required to believe, finds its germ and significance in that which God covenanted to Abraham. Did the Most High then say anything to his servant about a final deliverance from the pains of hell, or a translation to celestial palaces? Was his immortal soul to be conveyed at death to realms beyond the sky? It would, I suppose, be considered by many in our day a very defective gospel which did not emphasize and dilate upon these particulars. But God had not a word to say to Abraham about any such matters. The patriarch's faith fastened itself upon no such ideas.

Let us see. In Rom. iv. 13, Paul defines the promise as a guarantee that Abraham should be "heir of the world." In Gal. iii. 18, he says that God gave him the inheritance (of the land which fleshly seed afterwards possessed under the law) by promise. And in Heb. xi. 3, we read that he "was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance." Turning to Gen. xiii. 15, we find that this inheritance of land was to be held on no limited tenure, but on one that should be permanent. "All the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever." Paul shows that the "seed" in this case is Christ, Gal. iii. 16, and as many as have been baptized into him. vs. 27, 29. Any one can see what such a promise as this involved. A mortal man can inherit nothing forever. He might inherit a property for the term of his natural life, but that would be all. We brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. No man's goods or glory can descend after him into the grave. But Abraham did not even have his inheritance for this limited period, and he quite understood that such was to be the case. As Stephen said, Acts vii. 5, "God gave him none inheritance in it, no not so much as to set his foot on; yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession." He was told, when the promise was made, "Thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace: thou shalt be buried in a good old age." He sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange country," Heb. xi. 9, a country in which he had no sort of proprietorship; and he was content to do so down to the day of his death. In pure trust and confidence that the whole territory would one day have him as its perpetual owner and lord. He must, therefore, have been a believer in the resurrection of the dead. His must have been the conviction that God would bring him back to life again, and give him a nature that would last as long as his everlasting inheritance.

And what better hope could any man, in any generation have or want? There were life and incorruptibility bidden in that promise, which quite enables us to understand how the gospel was preached unto Abraham, for Paul says that Christ "hath abolished death," and brought these things to light through the gospel. 2 Tim. i. 10. We have simply to let our faith run in this groove. It will be worthless and unavailing if we place it anywhere else. It must be Abrahamic. Deliverance from the power of the grave and a permanent inheritance in the earth, are the things to which it must ever and exclusively point as the needle to the pole. This is real Scripture belief on the Lord Jesus Christ, who has been constituted a name of salvation. God has deposited these things in him who by delivering over to the claims of death the flesh and blood nature, has become free from its dominion, and by his resurrection has opened the gates of death, and prepared the way for the fulfilment in due time of all that was promised to the fathers. To him has been committed the honor of recalling them from their long sleep in the oblivion of the grave, and of endowing them with that immortality which will qualify them for their everlasting inheritance. It would seem indisputable that before we can have saving faith we must know what it is that we need to be saved from. Faith implies intelligence on this point. It does not admit of our being in a state of uncertainty about it. If we were struggling in the water, and believed that we should get out, our faith would fix itself on a distinct form of salvation. Under such circumstances we should know the precise nature of the peril to which we were exposed.

But there are, unfortunately, so many different opinions in the world touching what is to happen in the future, that most people are really unprepared to speak very definitely upon the subject, and the few that are, run the risk of exciting pity or indignation of the rest. But, pray, what is it from which we all need to be saved? What news would be most welcome to us in our present evil plight? Here we are, getting older every day, the grave ready for us at any time. If we form friendships they are snatched from us, or we from them, by the ruthless hand of death. If we are in tolerable health one day, we are liable to be prostrate and incapable the next.

Besides all which, we are harassed with a thousand cares which arise from the difficulty of getting enough for the requirements of this present vanishing existence. Surely deliverance from all this, even though not involving our transfer to some other part of the universe, would be exactly the salvation we need. We should be satisfied if we could permanently remain on this beautiful earth under better conditions than those which at present prevail, if we could always be strong and well, and be entirely free from distress and care, and see all mankind living in purity, and peace, and plenty, and the fear of God. Well, all this is wrapped up in the covenant made with Abraham. We read the Scriptures and find that this is none other than the salvation which God has promised in Christ. The whole human race is death-stricken because of sin, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin." This is what is amiss! The nations of the earth are mortal—hasting to the grave. Their succeeding generations vanish from the scene, and are no more. Man fail to realize this, and cherish the delusion that they are deathless beings—the heirs of illimitable duration. Hence they are blind to the peril which actually lies before them, and are grossly prepared to listen to any way of salvation which recognizes the real facts of the case. No doubt it is pleasanter to live in ignorance of those facts, for there is not a little that is distressing and sad about them. But earnest minds are more anxious to know what is the bitter truth than to cherish attractive fiction. That truth may indeed be dreadful, stern and repellant, but the opposite of it can do us no real good. Let us then by all means open our eyes to the exact position of affairs. If we do, we shall see that the tribes and families of mankind are in the state we have already described.

They are doomed to the desolations of the grave, and they cannot deliver themselves from this destiny by any act or virtue of their own. The strictest morality we may practice, cannot alter our natural relation to the law of sin and death.

The gospel alone is the divinely appointed agency of salvation. "Jesus said, I am the resurrection, and the life." "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." Paul declared that it had pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." It would be difficult to justify the mission of the Apostles if salvation were attainable independently of their testimony. This is no merely speculative affair, or bit of barren theological discussion, it goes down to the roots of all that concerns us as living men and women who desire to live forever. The possession of a saving faith will work wonders for us even now. It will do for us what it did for Abraham. It reconciled him to his lot as a stranger and pilgrim on the earth. He did not look for real and permanent satisfaction in this mortal state. His faith saved him from perpetual fret, and worry, and chafe over the vanities of a transient existence.

His worldly affairs might prosper, or they might not. It did not matter a very great deal. All would soon be over and gone, and he could rest in peace against the promised day of endless inheritance and blessing. He would then wake up surprised to find how long, and yet how short his many centuried sleep had been; for "the dead know not any thing," and are as oblivious of the lapse of time as they were of the eternity that went before their birth.

I know that such views of life would by many be pronounced unhealthy and abnormal; but are they not, after all, in strict accord with obvious fact? Think of the generations that are gone, with all their business, their anxieties, their worldly hopes and fears! There are thousands of skulls lying empty and pulseless in the cemetery that once were the seats of thoughts as scheming and distracting as yours today; and in a very short time (shorter perhaps, than you may suppose) yours will be lying in a similar condition! What then, is the good of fixing your whole heart's sympathy and care upon a vanishing picture, a mere passing panorama? "The fashion of this world passeth away." "He that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Life may be full of troubles, and barren of joys, but it cannot last beyond a certain time; and if it be lighted up with the glorious hope of the gospel, it will not be very difficult to lay it down. There is, after all, to the believer a genuine satisfaction in the fact expressed so pathetically by David in his declining years. "We are strangers before thee, and sojourners, as were all our fathers; our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding." With the worldling it is far otherwise; the prospect of death darkens his brightest hours, and the well assured fact that he must soon bid farewell to his cherished associations inflicts a sting in his fondest joys. Even if there were no issues to faith of the kind the promises exhibit, if the whole affair turned out a magnificent dream and fiction, and there was in reality nothing but an eternal grave before the sons of men, still let me pass through life under the inspiring and purifying influence of this splendid lie, rather than exist without aspiration, and die without hope! Expectancy, joy, nobility and elevation of character are better than their opposites, even though the foundation on which they rest be a foundation of sand. But we are by no means driven to this alternative. There are issues to faith of a demonstrably certain character. Its roots stretch far out into the historic past, and entwine themselves around facts which are among the best accredited of all that appertain to the human race. And it will culminate in such blessedness as hath not entered into the heart of the natural man. It is no trifling thing to be offered a body that will never decay, but have life in itself, and be perpetually resplendent, and vigorous, and perfect in all its faculties and functions, its every fibre throbbing with the pulsations of an immortal existence! To be accounted worthy of recognition by him to whom God has given all power in heaven and in earth, to be called to his side, and invited to assist him in the great work the Father has given him to do, to wield authority over the cities of the nations, and have unlimited resources of wealth, and wisdom, and beneficence, and strength at instantaneous command? These are the prominent characteristics of a future that will be crowned with transcendent glories—"an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven" for the person of Christ, in whom is treasured up all promised blessing for them "who are kept by the power of God unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time."

THE SEVENTH-DAY. No. 9.

THE SABBATH IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

With the opening of the gospel comes the most glorious period of the church's history. The Son of God himself stands before us clothed with all the authority of heaven. Matt. xxviii. 18. God says, "Hear ye him." Matt. xvii. 5. He came to introduce the gospel, "a new and living way," Heb x. 20, "the new covenant," "a better covenant," viii. 6, 8, which sets aside and supercedes the old (verse 13). Compared to the Jewish age it is a "great light," Matt. iv. 16, and the gospel church is represented as "a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet," Rev. xii. 1. All agree that the sun is the gospel, and the moon the old dispensation. Much which before was dark, shadowy, and mysterious, is now light and plain. Rom. xvi. 25, 26.

A great and radical change in the mode of worshiping God is now introduced. The new wine of the gospel must not be put into the old bottles of the Jewish law, nor the new covenant patched on to the old. Mark ii. 21, 22. Hence, "there is made of necessity a change also of the law," Heb. vii. 12, which was only a schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ," Gal. iii. 24, who "is the end of the law," Rom. x. 4. Now we are to hear Jesus, Matt. vii 24, and keep his commandments, John xiv. 15, 21, for we "are not under the law," Rom. vi. 14. Many institutions of the Old Testament which were once given in the most solemn manner, and by the authority of God himself, are no longer binding.

Now, where shall we look to find the clearest light upon these old institutions? Where shall we go to learn the real design of them all? Where shall we turn to obtain the necessary rules for a Christian to live by? Shall we go back to the moonlight of the Jewish law? to the starlight of the patriarchal age? or shall we come to the full sunlight of the gospel? Evidently the New Testament furnishes the clearest, best and only authoritative guide for the Christian. The Old Testament can only be read and rightly understood in the light of the New. But it is a fact that Sabbatarians have to go back to the Old Testament, even clear back to the uncertain institutions of the patriarchal age, as their clearest and most certain authority for the seventh day. The evidence from the New Testament only comes in as secondary and collateral. All their strongest arguments for the Sabbath are away back among the shadows of the Old Testament. Take these from them, and the very foundation has fallen out from their theory. I know that this is so, for I have gone over the ground a thousand times. I know just how a seventh day man feels, and where he rests his confidence. It is in Genesis and the law. Of the New Testament he is always a little shy. But is there any other Christian duty which is plainly laid down only in the Old Testament? I do not think of a single one, though in the past I rifled hard and long to find it. On all other points the New Testament is clear and full. In it we have chapter after chapter, epistle after epistle, and book after book, packed full of instruction on every Christian duty in every possible phase of it. The duty or the sin covered by each of the other nine commandments is directly named many times over in the New Testament. Out of many texts which might be quoted, see the following: First commandment, Matt. iv. 10; second, 1 John v. 21; third, Matt. v. 33–37; fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, Matt. xix. 18, 19. Strange to say, the duty to keep the seventh day is not once mentioned in the whole New Testament. There is not one single command from either Christ or any of his apostles to keep that day. It is not once said that it is wrong to work on the seventh day, or that God will bless any one for observing it. There is no promise for keeping it, no threatening for not keeping it. No one is ever reproved for working on the seventh day, nor approved for observing it. If disregarding the seventh day is so great a crime as its advocates now claim, it is unaccountable that no warning against it should be given in all the New Testament—not even once. Is all this silence merely accidental? No Sabbatarians have to believe; but the supposition is absurd. Evidently it was left out on purpose, the same as the pentecost, passover, new moons, sacrifices and the like.

The usual answer is that the Jews were already keeping the Sabbath, even too strictly, and therefore the Jewish Christians needed no instruction on this point. But this answer is not satisfactory. The Jews were just as strictly opposed to false gods and images, and yet over and over Christians are warned against these things. Besides, the great body of the Christian converts in the latter years of the gospel, were Gentiles, who had never kept the seventh day at all. Why should they not be instructed how to keep it? Why should they be repeatedly warned against all other evil practices of their former lives, but never warned against breaking the Sabbath as they certainly had done before? This was a point which I was never able to answer satisfactorily to myself while I kept the seventh day. The simple and manifest fact is, that it was not intended to bind the Jewish Sabbath upon the Christian church. Hence it was quietly allowed to drop out with other old covenant holy days and institutions.

The arguments offered out of the New Testament for the observance of the seventh day are few and not hard to answer. Let us examine the main ones. Jesus kept the seventh day, therefore we must. With Sabbatarians this argument has more weight than all others from the New Testament. It always did with me. But now I am satisfied that, when fairly considered, there is nothing in it. Jesus was born and lived all his life under the law. Gal. iv. 4. That law was binding till his death. Col. ii. 14. Of course he ought to have kept every item of that law till the cross, just as he evidently did do. On this point Elder Geo. I. Butler, the present leader of the seventh day Adventists, says: "He [Jesus] was born as a Jew, was circumcised when eight days old, and his parents went through the accustomed days of purification, according to the law of Moses. They presented the child as their first-born, as the law required, and offered as a sacrifice a pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons. He lived under all the ceremonies and observances of the law of Moses, the same as did the other Jews. Thus he was 'born under the law' and subject to it. All his life he was careful not to break any of its provisions, and he never permitted his disciples to do it to the day of his death. He even refused to labor especially for the Gentiles, because he was sent to 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel.'" ("The book of Galatians," p. 50.)

This is the plain truth in the case, and well stated. But it shows the utter fallacy of arguing that we must keep the seventh day just because Jesus did. If we observe one institution of the old law just because Jesus did, then, we should also keep all that he did; that is, live just as Jews did under the law of Moses! for that is just what Jesus did. He instructed his disciples to offer gifts upon the altar, Matt. v. 23, 24, sent a man to offer a gift, Matt. viii. 4, commanded his disciple to observe all that the Scribes taught, Matt. xxiii. 2, 3, and was very particular to keep the passover just according to law only the day before his death, Luke xxii. 7–15. But who thinks now of doing all these things because Jesus did? No one. Then why pick out the seventh day from all other holy days and rites and hold on to that while rejecting all the rest which he also observed? It seems as though a candid man must admit that this argument for the Jewish Sabbath is not a success. If that day is binding upon Christians it must be upon some other ground than because Jesus kept it while living as a Jew under the Jewish law.

Sabbatarians think they have a fair argument in the Acts. Here the seventh day is always called "the Sabbath," and it is evident that the Jewish Christians still observed it, and met with the Jews in worship on that day. From this it is concluded that all Christians should keep that day, too. This is based upon the false assumption that whatever customs and laws of the old covenant were still observed by the Christians after the resurrection, must be binding upon the church now.

A careful examination of what the disciples did really do for many years after the resurrection will show that they keep all the Mosaic law, including feast days, the Sabbath day, sacrifices, circumcision, vows, and the whole Jewish ritual. But they did this as Jews, according to their national law and long established custom. That they did not do so as a Christian duty is manifest from the fact that Gentile Christians were not required to observe these things. Acts xv. 19–28; xxi. 25. "As touching the Gentiles which believe, we have written and concluded that they observed no such thing."

Every mention of the Sabbath in Acts, without a single exception, is in connection with the Jewish worship on that day. Acts xiii. 14–16, 42, 45; xv. 21; xvi. 13; xvii. 2; xviii. 4. The law and the prophets were read, and Jewish worship conducted as usual. Certainly the disciples could not hold a distinctively Christian meeting here under these circumstances. They must assemble by themselves to worship Jesus and have the Lord's Supper, and that is just what we find them doing on the first day of the week. Acts xx. 7. There is no record of a single meeting of the Gentile Christians upon the seventh day, nor of Jewish Christians, except in the Jewish synagogues or Jewish worship.

As to the use of the word Sabbath, the facts are these:

1. Sabbath was a Jewish word never used till Moses. Ex. xvi. 2. Being used and appropriated by the Jews to the seventh day as the proper name of that day, it could not be used by the Christians for another day. 3. When the word "Sabbath" was used of the seventh day, it was used simply as the long established name of that day, and not as indicating any sacredness to the day. So another Jewish holy day, pentecost, continued to be called by that name, pentecost, though no sacredness of the day was meant by it. See Acts ii. 1; xx. 16. 4. The early Christians for several hundred years continued to call the Jewish day "the Sabbath," generally repudiating it as abolished, and always claiming Sunday as the day of Christian worship—the Lord's day. See Rev. i. 10, and any church history. 5. After the Jewish day had long been dropped out of notice the word "Sabbath" came to be used for the Christian rest day. It would have been better if the inspired term, "Lord's day," had been always retained and exclusively used.

STILES.—In Minneapolis, Minn., May 24, 1887, of apoplexy, Mrs. P. M. Stiles, aged 77 years.

The subject of this notice early professed faith in Christ, uniting with the M. E. Church, and later took advanced ground with the Christian denomination. When the glad news of Christ's near coming with kindred doctrines, was proclaimed, she, with her now aged companion, gladly believed and continued steadfast in the faith through all the following years. The Bible was her daily study and THE RESTITUTION prized above all periodicals. Perhaps it is enough to add, she was best loved by those who knew most of her, and many tokens of respect were shown by friends gained in her few years' residence in this city. Service in harmony with her faith was conducted by Elder W. J. Hobbs.

M. M. NICHOLS.

P. S. The foregoing is a synopsis of an article written for THE RESTITUTION soon after our mother's death, which was lost in transit to the publishing office.

ROBBINS.—At Ripley, Ill., Aug. 30, 1887, Elizabeth Robbins, aged seventy-two years, five months and twenty-eight days.

Mother Robbins was born in Fairfield Township, Crawford Co., Pa., on March 2, 1815, and resided in that County until 1839, when her husband, Garrett W. Robbins, she moved to Brown Co., Ill., where she has since resided. She embraced the One Faith of the gospel, and became an obedient believer some thirty years ago. She was an earnest and faithful worker in the Master's Vineyard showing her faith by her works, ever forgetful of self, constantly thoughtful of the welfare of others, and beloved by all who knew her. She leaves two sons and five daughters, besides grand children to mourn the loss of a loving mother, who was ever ready with sympathy and counsel. Feeling that her end was near, she called her brothers and sisters and children to her bedside taking each one by the hand, bade them farewell, requesting them to meet her in the kingdom. She fell asleep with the full assurance that she would have a part in the first resurrection when the Life-giver comes to make up his jewels.

I would not live always,
No, welcome the tomb;
Since Jesus has lain there,
I dread not the gloom.
There sweet be my sleep
Till he bids me arise,
And hail him in triumph
Descending the skies.

THE CHURCH OF GOD.

"Elect, glorious! here I seek in songs
Of everlasting praise to belong,
To God eternal praise belongs,
Who doth my feet directory.
Then church of God, awake, awake,
For light beams from on high,
From earth and dust my garments shake,
My glory's dawning nigh.

"To raise thee high above the earth,
God will his power employ;
He'll turn thy mourning into mirth,
Thy sorrow into joy.
Arising, put thyself array,
In all thy garments gloriously,
Thy way shall lead thee to the holy,
Holy, holy city.

"Jerusalem, the Lord will place his name,
And place on thee his delight,
And place on thee a diadem,
Divinely full and bright;
And it no more be the dwelling place
Of him that reigns above,
Yea, thou shalt be a town'd with grace
And everlasting love.

"The joy of nations thou shalt be;
A bright and shining light;
For God is in the midst of thee,
To keep thee day and night.
He'll bring thy wandering children home,
And gather those without;
And with a wall of jasper stone,
Will guard this sacred about.

"Arise, O Zion, praise thy King,
And make his name thy theme;
With joy and triumph loudly sing;
For he is true and just.
O Zion, sing with truthful voice,
Thy great Redeemer's praise;
In his almighty power, rejoice
Throughout eternal days."

The Angelic Rule and its Relation to Mankind and the Messianic Rule.

When the Most High was distributing nations by allotment, while he was sowing sons of Adam, he set boundaries for nations according to a number of God's angels; and Jacob's royal people became the Lord's distributed portion, Israel his inheritance with assorted boundaries. Deut. xxxii. 8, 9.

Here is a definite statement of the assignment of the affairs of mankind to the angelic rule or to "a certain number of God's angels," "the Most High" reserving for himself and his own special care and direction a single nation, the descendents of Jacob namely. This event seems to have occurred soon after the "fall of Adam" and the result of this divine decree is clearly apparent in revelation from this time on. All the patriarchal "visitations" of God are through the agency and the personal appearances of these angelic rulers under God. The cherubim indeed lead Adam and Eve out of the "paradise of delights" after their disobedience; angels appear to Habraam and Sarra and Agar with messages of wisdom, mercy and love; the law "is delivered to Mouses as a mediator at the hand of angels;" God's angel calls Mouses indeed to his great work "from out the flaming bramble-bush," and it is God's angel in the pillar of cloud by day and fire by night that goes before Mouses as a leader of God's "royal people" through that forty years test-trial in the wilderness; all along in the experiences of the prophets it is through the supernatural powers of angels spiritually and not naturally exerted that revelations and manifestations of God's will and wisdom are made known to God's "royal people."

"Not so hath he dealt with any other nation." "The way of vision" was one of these many ways. The manifestation by "signs and portents" was another. The divine direction of the "prophet" and "leader's" thought and purpose in "dreams" was another. The specially inspired, oracularly delivered "spoken word" to be exactly and minutely written and handed down to posterity was another and perhaps the highest form of the divine use of the angelic instrumentality. As evidence of this see Dan. viii. 16, 17. "And I heard a voice of a man in the middle of the Ouhai (river) and he called and said, Gabriel, cause this one to understand in the way of vision; and he came and stood near to where I was standing; and when he had come I was struck dumb with awe and fell upon my face; and he said unto me, understand, thou son of man, For yet awhile unto the end of an appointed time is the way of vision." Also Dan. ix. 21-23. "And while I was yet speaking in my votive prayer, lo even a man, Gabriel, whom I saw in the vision, namely, in the headship (vision) (the one given in the 7th chapter where "the headship" or "authority" is bestowed by "the Ancient of Days" upon Christ and his saints); and he touched me about the hour of the evening sacrifice; and caused me to understand and talked with me and said, Daniel, I have come forth now to conduct thee in the way of understanding. To the full extent of thy supplication did word go forth and I have come to announce it to thee, because a man of longing desire art thou; and be thou apprehensive in the spoken (or unspoken) word and do thou understand in the coming way.

See also Judges vi. 12 and context, where the angel appears unto Gideon; also 13th chapter of Judges where the angel appears unto Manoe and his wife and announces the birth and mission of Sampson. All these instances illustrate what I have already stated in regard to the angels being instrumental controlers of the destinies and affairs of individuals and nations under God.

Coming down now to the record of the New Covenant Scriptures, though very much more could be said from the Old had I time and space, see the announciation to Elizabeth of the forerunner "John the Baptizer" and to the virgin Mary of Jesus, the Christ, by this same angel Gabriel. Also the several appearances to Joseph in "dreams;" their constant watchfulness and frequent appearances in the experiences of the Christ, specially significant among these being the "ministering angels" in the "trial in the wilderness for forty days" and the "angel strengthening him" in the garden of Gethsemane. Also the angels at the sepulchre who were instrumental in his resurrection. Also the angelic manifestation to Paul or Saul when Christ called him to his great work and tribulation. Also the angel of the Apocalypse after Christ's exaltation, and specially designated as his angel. Why his angel? Because the "authority" had been "changed" as it had been announced to Daniel that it would be. God's angels had now become "his Christ's" angels. For "what are they all but serving spirits sent forth to serve those who are destined to inherit salvation?"

And what is this special "out-pouring" of "the spirit of the truth" but the increased activity of this angelic host wielding means and agencies according (not as Drummond puts it to "natural law in the spiritual world") but spiritual law, in the natural world? "Ye are in the world (this cosmos or this order of things) but not of it." Why? Because ye have at your call these intelligent spiritual agents wielding subtle spiritual agencies and forces that are higher than the natural but not contrary to them any more than my ability to overcome gravitation within my sphere is contrary to the so-called law of gravity. If we are renewed or regenerated, a new creation has begun in us according to the spiritual and we are in and under the energizing forces of this spiritual kingdom as we were before in and under the physical or natural even though we be in the embryo or germinal condition.

Consider the latent force in an acorn before it is put into the ground and dies; and then think of that force being asserted in the germinal process of its new life. When the conditions of its germinal environment demands it, it has even been known to rend asunder the solid rock. Reason then by analogy up to some faint conception of the latent spiritual energy in every "child of God in promise" with the spiritual potency of God's own life waiting only for its own homogeneous environment. "Shall anything separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus?" If a rock cannot separate the germinal life of the oak from the sunlight and the other beneficent environments of the natural cosmos, is there any rock of impossibility that shall separate our germinal life from the "Son of Righteousness" in our spiritual cosmos and all its other beneficent environing influences?

"Doth not the angel (or angelic host) of the Lord camp about those who fear him?" "Do not their angels in heaven (not the angels of little children according to the flesh, but little children according to the spirit, Christ's newly begotten ones) always look at the face of my Father who is in heaven?" The angels here referred to are the angels we have been talking about, the angelic "authorities, official powers and intelligent forces" referred to so often by Paul and Peter and Jude in their epistles, whom Peter speaks of as "greater in might and ability" than mere human beings, but by their Lord made subject to our needs through our Lord Jesus Christ, not to be worshipped, (Paul cautions us against this particularly as well as does John in the Apocalypse) but under God to be enlisted in the service and royal work of the saints. The Catholic Church has fallen into the trap set by Satan for it in this matter, and has done just what Paul cautioned the saints against and has allowed this great constitutional right in "the heavenly constitution of things" to be "arbitrated away" from the saints, and the Protestant Church has inherited the apostate error.

"The night is far spent, the day is at hand and it is full time we awoke out of sleep" and realized "our high calling in Christ Jesus" and the "great power" that is committed to the saints on earth. The "all things are yours" and "all official power hath been given me in heaven and on the earth" mean a great deal more to the Church of Christ than has yet been realized—more now and here, right here, not off in some indefinite, intangible kingdom of the hereafter and of ghosts. The saints, if they only know it, have the power, and that too officially conferred, to assert spiritual law in the natural world through spiritual servitors who not only understand the spiritual laws but are bound by the fiat of the Almighty to obedience. "Whatever ye shall bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven," was addressed to saints. Christ as a "Son of God" in promise, or same, but "a son of man" in fact, exemplified this truth. The apostles and early church as saints or sons of God in promise but sons of men in fact, likewise exemplified it; and this is the significance of the "sonship" and true sanctification. "To them gave he official power (or qualification) to become offspring of God" means a great deal more than repentance and conversion. "With what sort of official power (not authority) dost thou do these things" finds its answer in what has been thus far said, but not in perfunctory "ghostly" teaching.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "8" and reads "Jay8" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1888. "Feb" February, "Mar" March "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June, "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday (D. V. in Bland and Heller's Block, Room 36, 874½ Ontario Street, Corner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Strangers from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are welcome.

THE COMING AGE,

—1?6—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WESTBEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian [illegible], and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar powers, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, in shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, justice, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unchangeable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

THE SEVENTH-DAY. No. 10.

(Copyrighted. 1887.)

THE SABBATH IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Consider a few facts as to why the Jewish Christians did not immediately give up the observance of the seventh day. How carefully and gradually Jesus unfolded his new doctrines, even to the chosen apostles. To the multitude he spoke only in parables "as they were able to hear it." Mark iv. 33. Had Jesus at once plainly told the people of the radical change which he had come to make in the Jewish system of worship, they would have killed him immediately. Even the apostles would have been horrified, and doubtless would all have left him. During all the ministry of our Lord, nothing stands out more prominently than the fact that he was gradually but cautiously preparing the minds of his disciples for the great change which his gospel was destined to make in the w[illegible] of God. The great obstacles he had to contend with were their narrow views, their tenacity for the forms and ceremonies and letter of the law, and Jewish ideas of God's kingdom. That he was to take the throne of David, subjugate the world to Israel, and carry on the Jewish mode of worship with the temple service—this idea was so firmly rooted in the minds of even the apostles, that they could not understand Jesus even when he plainly told them to the contrary. Hence the Savior simply left them to outgrow these ideas as the nature of his gospel more fully dawned upon them after his resurrection and ascension and the descent of the Holy Spirit. Just before Jesus died, he said: "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth." John xvi. 12, 13. How often he had to say to them, "O fools, and slow of heart to believe." Luke xxiv. 25. "Are ye also yet without understanding?" Matt. xv. 16.

Forty days after the resurrection still found them clinging to their old Jewish idea of the temporal reign of Jesus at Jerusalem. "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Knowing that it was impossible to correct their wrong notions by a mere statement, Jesus left them to outgrow these errors as they learned more of the gospel. Now follow them through the book of Acts, and observe how long and tenaciously they held on to all the observances of the old Jewish law, not only the Sabbath, but all the temple service and ceremonies of the Mosaic law. On Pentecost we find them keeping the sacred day with the other Jews. Acts ii. As late as ten years after the resurrection they were "preaching the word to none but unto Jews only." Acts xi. 19. Not a sermon had they thought of preaching to a Gentile till God, by a special miracle, sent Peter to Cornelius. Acts x. As late as this Peter was scrupulously regarding the Mosaic law of meats. He said, "I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean." verse 14. And he designed to keep right on observing it. And when the Holy Spirit came upon the Gentiles, the disciples were astonished "because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost." verse 45. When he returned to Jerusalem the whole church was in an uproar over it. "And when Peter was come up to Jerusalem, they that were of the circumcision contended with him, saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them." Acts xi. 2, 3.

Up to this time, then, we find the church at Jerusalem, with Peter at its head, still keeping the Jewish law concerning food, and refusing to eat with Gentiles. Now study the great council at Jerusalem, held over twenty years after the resurrection. Acts xv. Not only did the whole church in Judea keep the entire Mosaic law in all its rites, including circumcision, but they endeavored also to force it upon the Gentile converts. verses 1, 19. But through the influence of Paul, this move was defeated. If it had not been that, in the providence of God, Paul was raised up to oppose it, the whole Christian church would have been placed under the bondage of the Mosaic law. As it was, that council freed only the Gentile converts from obedience to Moses' law. Acts xv. 19, 23; xxi. 25. All Jewish Christians still keep it.

Even as late as A. D. 60, or nearly thirty yers after the cross, we still find the whole Jewish church in Judea strictly keeping the law of Moses as to circumcision, offerings, vows, shaving of the head, etc. Not only did they themselves observe all these rites of the old law, but they required all Jewish Christians throughout the world to do the same. When Paul went up to Jerusalem only a few years before his death, they demanded of him a pledge that he himself also kept these rites. Read carefully the following: "And when they heard it, they glorified the Lord, and said unto him, Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law. And they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs. What is it therefore? the multitude must needs come together: for they will hear that thou art come. Do therefore this that we say to thee: We have four men which have a vow on them. Them take, and purify thyself with them, and be at charges with them, that they may shave their heads; and all may know that those things, whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing; but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law. As touching the Gentiles which believe, we have written and concluded that they observe no such thing, save only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols, and from blood, and from fornication. Then Paul took the men, and the next day purifying himself with them entered into the temple, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification, until that an offering should be offered for every one of them." Acts xxi. 20-26.

These words prove all I have claimed above, and show conclusively that the Jewish Christians observed all the rites of the law of Moses as late as that, which was but a few years before the fall of Jerusalem. All church historians agree that the Jewish Christians continued to observe the seventh day even for some time after the fall of Jerusalem. But they also observed Sunday. The Ebionites, Jews, "observed both the Jewish and the Christian Sabbath." ("Ritter's church history," p. 29.) Neander says: "Churches consisting of Jewish converts, although they received the festival of Sunday, retained also that of the Sabbath." (p. 186.) "The Jewish Christians of Palestine retained the entire Mosaic law." (Giesler's "Ecclesiastical history," quoted in Andrew's "History of Sabbath," p. 334.) These historical facts help us to understand the record in Acts.

If we consider a moment we shall not wonder that they clung with such tenacity to the observances of that law. Every item of it had been given to their forefathers in the most solemn manner, either directly by God himself or through his holy prophets, whose memory they held in the greatest reverence. The wrath of God had been threatened against the slightest violation of this law. All the blessings of heaven were promised for obedience to it. Deut. xxviii. 1-20. Its unchanging perpetuity seemed to be taught throughout the Old Testament. Thus: "All his commandments are sure. They stand fast forever and ever. Psa. cxi. 7, 8. "Every one of the righteous judgments endureth forever." Psa. cxix. 160. God gave Levi "the covenant of an everlasting priesthood." Num. xxv. 13. Aaron was to offer "a perpetual incense before the Lord." Ex. xxx. 8. Circumcision "shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant." Gen. xvii. 13. "Ye shall keep it [the passover] a feast by an ordinance forever." Ex. xii. 14. "Observe the Sabbath throughout their generations for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel forever." Ex. xxxi. 16, 17. Easily enough a Jew would give these expressions the strongest possible construction, and conclude that every item of that law was to be perpetual. Every child was taught this from infancy up.

It was the observance of this law that had separated the Jews out from, and lifted them above, all the nations of the earth as the special people of God. Every rite and ceremony of that law had been hallowed by the observance of 1,500 years. Their forefathers had laid down their lives for that law. A word against it was blasphemy. Acts vi. 13, 14. In view of all this, think of asking a pious Jew to give up the keeping of his holy law, or any item of it. No indeed, such a thought could not be entertained for a moment, not even by the disciples. Hence Jesus, as a wise leader, did not attempt it, but allowed them time to learn better as they came to comprehend more clearly the wonderful change which the gospel really carried with it. Even among the apostles, Paul seems to have been the only one who fully took it in. Elder Butler, the seventh day Adventist leader, truly says: "Indeed, it may well be doubted whether a large portion of the early church who were Jews before conversion ever fully realized the scope and extent of the gospel in setting aside those laws peculiarly Jewish. They clung to them, and were zealous for them long after they were abolished at the cross. To Paul we are indebted, through the blessing of God, for the only full explanation of the proper relation of these laws to the plan of salvation." ("Law in Galatians," p. 8.)

This is the simple truth exactly. Hence it is that in the earlier gospels of Matthew and Mark and in the epistles of James and Peter, you find little or no reference to a change of the Jewish law. It was certain who "came from James," Gal. ii. 12, that tried to enforce that law upon Gentile converts, and it is to Matthew and James that Sabbatarians now go for their strongest texts. Matt. v. 17-19; James ii. 8-12. It is Paul who furnishes us the strong statements against the keeping of the Mosaic law, Sabbath and holy days. Let Sabbatarians meditate upon this point a little. The hottest battle which the great apostle to the Gentiles had to fight all his life was right upon the question of the observance of that law and these things, and his bitterest opponents were his own Christian brethren who were Jews. Acts xv. 1, 2; Gal. ii. 1-14. To conciliate these as far as possible, according to his own rule, "unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews," 1 Cor. ix. 20; he, himself, as a Jew, not as a Christian, submitted to keep all the Jewish law, as we have seen. Acts xxi. 20-26. He circumcised Timothy "because of the Jews," Acts xvi. 3, and kept the pentecost, Acts xx. 16.

How much, then, does it prove in favor of the Jewish Sabbath to find that it was still called "the Sabbath," or that it was kept by the Jewish Christians, or even by Paul himself? Just nothing at all; for by the same argument, as we have seen, we must observe the passover, pentecost, offer offerings, make vows, shave our heads, be circumcised, and keep all the rites of the Mosaic law the same as those disciples did for years.

One of the strongest arguments the seventh day people make from the New Testament is from Paul's statement, Acts xxv. 8; xxviii. 17, that he had done nothing contrary to "the law of the Jews" or the "customs of their fathers." Then he must have kept the Sabbath, for that was the law and custom of his people. Yes, indeed, and so it was also to circumcise, to keep all the feast days, offer offerings, etc. Hence Paul must have done all these, and therefore we must do it too! So it is that the arguments for the seventh day lead right back to keeping all the Jewish observances of the old law.

It was zeal for the law that stirred up the Jews to the most intense hatred of Paul, the one apostle above all others who, as the apostle of the Gentiles, showed the fulfilment and end of that law in Christ. They cried out, "Men of Israel, help, this is the man that teacheth all men everywhere against the people and the law." Acts xxi. 28. For this they dogged his steps from city to city, plotted his destruction, and never rested till he was killed. It was the same mistaken zeal for that law which led the believing Christian Jews "to command them [the Gentiles] to keep the law of Moses." Acts xxv. 5. Everywhere they followed after Paul, entered the churches which he had gathered, and urged upon their necks that yoke of bondage from which Christ had made them free. Of all the trials which Paul had to endure, this stirred up his righteous wrath the most, till at last he denounced against them the curse of God. Gal. i. 18. To his children he cried out, "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you?" "Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law?" "Ye did run well, who did hinder you?" Gal. iii. 1; iv. 21; v. 7. Paul bore with more patience even the sins of his churches than he did the Judaizing teachings of these misguided disciples; for the one was only personal and temporary, but the other was fundamental, a perversion of the gospel, leading away from Christ back into Judaism.

A study of church history shows that this same Judaizing spirit has cropped out here and there all along from the days of the apostles down. Honest, conscientious men, reading the strong expressions of the Old Testament, conclude that these old institutions must still be binding. Hence all who disregard them are sinners, breaking the law of God. Immediately they are fired up with zeal to proselyte everybody to their views. Into the churches they go, into other men's labors they enter, just as their brethren of old followed after Paul, taking his converts, dividing his churches, turning them against their own father in the gospel, judging and condemning everbody who did not "keep the law" according to their ideas. "They have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge." Rom. x. 2. Paul exactly describes them thus: "And not as Moses, which put a vail over his face, that the children of Israel could not steadfastly look to the end of that which is abolished. But their minds were blinded; for until this day remaineth the same vail untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament; which vail is done away in Christ. But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the vail is upon their heart." 2 Cor. iii. 13-16. Yes; reading Moses and the Old Testament is where they are blinded. There is where Judaizers dwell the most, just as all Sabbatarians do now, till they have more of the spirit of the old law than they do the spirit of the gospel.

It was my misfortune to fall under these influences in my youth. Twenty-eight years of the best of my life I gave to such work. I have been through the mill, and know its sad effects. It has blighted and saddened my life, as it has thousands of others. From my heart I pity those who are now daily being led into the same error. A few can be helped; the most cannot. "Bewitched," is what Paul calls it, and my experience is that he hit the right word.

D. M. CANRIGHT.

P. S.—Lest my position should be misunderstood before I have time to explain it, I will say here that I believe as strongly as Sabbatarians do in the perpetuity of the holy, immutable law of God, and every moral principle taught in the Old Testament. The Methodist Discipline (Articles of religion, sect. 6) exactly expresses my position on the law: "Although the law given from God by Moses as touching ceremonies and rites, doth not bind Christians, nor ought the civil precepts thereof of necessity be received in any commonwealth; yet, notwithstanding, no Christian whatsoever is free from the obedience of the commandments which are called moral."

Faith as a Grain of Mustard Seed.

Jesus came down the Mount of Olives from Bethany. On the way he cursed a fig tree, on the return at the close of the day the tree was dried up. His disciples were astonished. "If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed ye shall say to this mountain, be thou removed and cast into the sea, and it shall be done." The Mount of Olives is the mountain spoken of. If you have a seed of genuine faith, it shall increase in strength and power until you shall control the physical world. And when my feet stand on the Mount of Olives in that day we shall command this mountain to remove. It shall obey the command. A part to the north and part to the south into the Dead Sea. It will be by the faith and power of his saints that Zechariah's prediction will be fulfilled. No mountain has yet been removed. Power over the physical world is a fact yet to be realized. When Paul and Silas prayed and sang praises at midnight to God there was an earthquake shock that shook the prison to its foundation and the prison doors were opened and their chains fell off. This mighty power will be first felt and exercised in the City of the Great King.

C. BOARDMAN.

Conference Report.

The Michigan Annual Conference commenced Thursday evening, Sept. 29th, at Watson, Allegan Co., Mich., according to previous announcement. Our hearts were made glad at the commencement by meeting Bro. Chaplin, whose countenance tells of a Christian heart and life. And this was not all. To our joyful surprise two more preaching brethren had come from the old Atlantic shore, Brother Samuel Wilson and Brother G. W. Young. Though these two brethren had lived so far from us yet they preached the same gospel as we. Our brethren were all thankful for their labors while with us. Our meeting was well represented from different parts of the State. There were nine discourses delivered, two by Brother Wilson, two by Brother Young, four by Brother Chaplin, and one by Elder B. Woodward, with also several social meetings where all spoke of their hopes and joys in and through Christ. Meeting closed with the Communion Supper. Four were buried with Christ in baptism, and may the good Lord direct them that they may prove faithful unto the end.

JAFFA.

ITS ANTIQUITY.

Jaffa, the proposed new Mission Station of the British Society in the Holy Land, is undoubtedly one of the oldest cities of the ancient world. Classic authors assign to it a wondrous antiquity, for they affirm that it existed before the deluge, and Pliny asserts that Noah built the ark at Jaffa! To Greek and Roman writers, however, it was known only in connection with the mythological fable of Andromeda, and the same author—Pliny—says, that in front of the city stood a rock, whereon were to be seen the vestiges of the chains by which Andromeda was bound, when Perseus rescued her from the sea monster that threatened to devour her, and washed the wounds he received in the conflict, in the waters of its sea. Considering its geographical position, as the only natural port of Palestine and Jerusalem, the date of whose foundation is lost in hoary antiquity, there can be no doubt that Jaffa is also a very old city. It was, at all events, well known in the days of Joshua, who names it as on the boundary of the territory assigned to the tribe of Dan. Josh. xix. 46.

ITS NAME.

Jaffa is mentioned four times in the Old Testament—in Joshua xix. 46; 2 Chron. ii. 16; Jonah i. 3; and Ezra iii. 7—as יָפוֹ Yafo, but with the addition of an א—alef—in Ezra, a characteristic of the Hebrew of his age. Most etymologists derive its name from the Hebrew verb יָפָה—yafa—"beautiful," and the situation of the town, covering the declivities of a conical eminence, projecting into the blue waves of the Mediterranean, with a back-ground of very luxuriant evergreen orchards of orange, lemon, and olive trees, must make it beautiful indeed, specially when viewed from the sea; and this goes far to confirm the etymology that links its name with yafa, "beautiful." Others derive it from Japheth, Noah's son, which, could it be sustained, would go to illustrate the classic tradition about the building of Noah's Ark. The Greek transforms yafa into Joppy, which the Latin renders Joppe, and thence the English Joppa.

Geographically, it will suffice to describe Jaffa as the port of Jerusalem, distant about forty miles, and quasi-distant from Gaza and the promontory of Carmel.

DEEPLY INTERESTING ASSOCIATIONS.

Whether Jaffa owes its origin to the ante-diluvians, like Baalbek and other places, or to Noah's son, it is unquestionably a town of deep interest to the Biblical student, and especially to the Christian.

Here it was that the wisdom and enterprising spirit of Solomon, the great promoter of commerce and the arts among the Jews, built a navy, in alliance with those renowned navigators of antiquity—the Phœnicians—thereby opening an outlet for the products of Palestine, and fostering foreign traffic with the shores of the Mediterranean. At the same time, he established on the opposite side—at Eziongeber, on the Red Sea—another emporium of maritime trade, from whence his ships went to Ophir, and returned laden with gold and other valuable merchandise. 1 Kings ix. 26-28. It was the golden age of God's ancient people: a reign of peace and prosperity.

To Jaffa it was that the Tyrians carried the cedar timber of the forests of Lebanon, "as floats," for the construction of the Temple of God at Jerusalem, 2 Chron. ii. 16; as also for the building of the second Temple. Ezra iii. 7.

From Jaffa the prophet Jonah embarked in a ship going to Tarshish, in the vain attempt to flee from the presence of the Lord, rather than convey what he thought was likely to prove a fruitless warning to the inhabitants of Nineveh. Jonah i. 3.

In the days of the Maccabees—those lion-hearted sons of the priests—Jaffa was a great fortress as well as a port of extensive commercial transactions with maritime nations, so that Phœnicians, Egyptians, Syrians, Greeks, and other strangers constituted the majority of its population. These foreigners became so wealthy and powerful as to be, with the aid of their fleets in the port, the virtual rulers of the city. Josephus relates that on one occasion they enticed 200 Jews on board, and then drowned them in the sea. For this act of treacherous and barbarous cruelty, Judas Maccabæus took signal revenge of the cosmopolitan inhabitants, for he stormed the town by night, and burnt all the shipping in its port.

During the last Jewish war against their conquerors, Jaffa suffered terribly, for the Roman army recaptured it by a sudden attack, and put upwards of 8000 of its inhabitants to death.

But it is in Apostolic times that Jaffa becomes a place of thrilling interest to the Christian. Jaffa was the dwelling-place of a disciple—a Christian woman—whose name is a household word in all Christian lands, as the very emblem of charity and good works; and all female associations for the relief of the poor and needy delight to call themselves by her Greek synonyme. Dorcas has left a noble example of purest charity and self-denial. Her name will remain enshrined in Christian hearts while the world lasts, and will be re-echoed in heaven with affectionate admiration. She had sickened and died. Peter was just then at Lydda, only ten miles distant across the celebrated plain of Sharon—the land of roses and lilies, Canticles ii. 1,—and he was sent for. He went, and all the widows, surrounding the lifeless corpse of their beloved Tabitha in the upper chamber, showed him with tears the coats and garments which her devoted fingers had wrought for the poor. Sending them out of the room, he knelt in prayer, and turning to the inanimate body, called out "Talitha, cumi," and she arose and sat up, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified. Her restoration to life was well known throughout all Joppa, and many believed in the Lord. Peter tarried many days there with one Simon, a tanner, whose house, by the sea-side, is shown to this day. Acts ix. 36-43.

It was during Peter's sojourn at Jaffa that another event of the highest importance and world-wide results, took place, whereby the Gentile world became partakers of the blessings of the gospel. The deeply interesting story of Cornelius, the centurion, and of Peter's remarkable vision, while he prayed on the house-top; and the wondrous results that have ensued to the world at large through that vision, are familiar to all attentive readers of the Acts of the Apostles. chap. x. There, at Jaffa, it was that Peter learnt the grand lesson of God's love to all men, whether Jews or Gentiles—that Christ had come to be "a Light to lighten the Gentiles," as well as "the Glory of his people Israel." Luke ii. 32. What a change has that vision produced in the world!

THE PROPOSED MISSION.

And now, after the lapse of eighteen centuries, it is proposed that, like as God sent Peter, the Jew, to Jaffa, to preach the gospel to Cornelius, the Gentile, so now Gentile Christians should send a missionary to that same Jaffa, to preach Christ to its Jewish residents, and to the thousands of Jews from Russia and other lands, who land at Jaffa on their way to Jerusalem and the interior of Palestine. It would be giving practical effect to that most eloquent "Even so" of Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles. "Even so," as ye, Gentiles, have obtained mercy through the Jews, even through their unbelief, which left the apostles free to turn to the Gentiles and carry the Gospel to them—"even so," now, it is proposed that through the mercy of you, Gentile believers, the Jews of Jaffa may likewise obtain God's mercy in Christ. Rom. xi. 30, 31.

ITS IMPORTANCE.

The importance of such a mission, if conducted by an experienced and tried missionary, could not be exaggerated. He must be a man of no inconsiderable qualifications and attainments, for he must be a linguist, as well as a Christian whose heart yearns for the salvation of souls. He must know—1. Judæo-Spanish, the vernacular or domestic tongue of the Jews of Palestine; 2. Arabic, the language of the country; 3. The Lingua Franca—a mixture of Italian, French, etc.,—spoken by the commercial and educated classes of whatever nationality throughout the Levant; and 4. He must be able to converse in Hebrew with learned Jews, and be thoroughly conversant with Jewish literature in its different branches, and with Jewish modes of thought, life, and customs. Above all, he must be possessed of a sympathetic and kindly heart with the Jews in all their sorrows and trials.

Such a laborer, so qualified, and imbued with a spirit of genuine love to the Jews, will be a great blessing to these of Jaffa. If he does no more than exhibit true Christian sympathy with their trials and sufferings; be a ready counsellor and helper in their difficulties; and induce them to read the New Testament and religious tracts, he will do a good preparatory work, by removing prejudices and encouraging enquiries. But, by the blessing of God on his ministry, he may achieve greater victories over sin and Satan, and contribute to the hastening of that glorious day when "all Israel shall be saved." Rom. xi. 26.—A. Ben-Oliel, in Jewish Herald.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, NOVEMBER 2, 1887. NO. 41.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

Payable in advance. Three and six Months in proportion.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

The Restitution advocates the grand "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint helps with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous and the total destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

WE reprint an article from the pen of Dr. Gordon in which he clearly shows that Romanism is the same demonized system that it was in the palmy days of the Inquisition. The Great Harlot is perfectly characterized by the Revelator as "drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus." Rev. xvii. 6. "Her sins have reached unto heaven," and God remembers and will soon avenge the blood of countless millions upon her. Her burning day is nigh.

THE Supreme Court of the United States has not yet announced its decision in the anarchist cases. Some few days will be required to prepare and place before the world a decision in a case that is now challenging the attention of every civilized country. Judge Gary, States Attorney Grinnell, and others, are receiving threatening letters from the anarchists denouncing vengeance should the condemned criminals be executed. The officials treat these cowardly missives with the contempt they deserve.

BROTHER G. W. Young's fourth paper —"A Pleasant Trip and Visit"—came too late for this week's issue. He gives us an assurance that he will write more frequently for THE RESTITUTION hereafter; a purpose that we shall be glad indeed to have carried out. Brother L. C. Thomas has also sent a very interesting paper giving an account of a tour he has made with cheering results. Papers like these make us better acquainted with the brotherhood, and with the prosperity of the cause we all have so much at heart.

THERE is no subject existing more attention or undergoing more careful investigation in our own times than the subject of Human Destiny. Resultant conclusions are quite divergent. The doctrine of eternal torment, as the doom of the ungodly, is being rapidly discarded. To give our readers some idea of a book recently received, and of the views of its author, we print an entire chapter from the work in the current issue of our paper. In some instances we should find occasion to differ with the talented author in both his premises and conclusions. Notably so in the wide application he gives to our Lord's parable of the sheep and goats. We are gravely mistaken if this parable has reference to any portion of the human family excepting the existing nations who shall be found living upon earth when our Lord returns and who remain after his own people, the church, are taken away. Nations are one of the subjects of prophecy as well as individuals—a matter of Eschatology that deserves more critical attention than it has hitherto received. Both the works issued by Mr. L. C. Baker are deserving of dispassionate reading and careful comparison with the Scriptures. We close with saying that we are also persuaded that Hades and Gehenna are states and conditions of doom of a more distinct nature than our author seems to teach.

Futurism and Fact.

It is obvious that one may gaze so fixedly into the future as to be unconscious of the most palpable facts which are occurring in the present. This is the exceeding peril to which the system of interpretation called "Futurism" is exposed. It is looking so intently for an antichrist yet to come that it seems quite oblivious to what has come and what is now passing on the earth, as indicating the presence of Antichrist.

Benjamin Willis Newton, an eminent expounder of that school, finds a proof that the Papacy is not the "little horn," or antichrist, which seems to him so decisive that he prints it in capitals. Daniel vii. 21, (R. V.) reads: "I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; until the Ancient of days came," etc. Upon which Mr. Newton remarks: "If I am sure of anything, I am sure of this, that neither myself nor my fellow-Christians are at this moment being persecuted unto death," etc. Therefore he concludes, that the Papacy cannot be the predicted Antichrist, since that power must be found persecuting until the coming of Christ.

Now, as throwing light on the question whether the Papacy is still persecuting, I append the following items cut from the religious newspapers which came to me in one single week. Let the reader answer from the evidence which they contain whether Mr. Newton's "fellow-Christians" are at this moment exempt from persecution unto death:

The Converted Catholic quotes the following from the Western Watchman, a Roman Catholic journal published at St. Louis: "Protestantism! We would draw and quarter it. We would impale it and hang it up for crows' nests. We would tear it with pincers, and fire it with hot irons. We would fill it with molten lead and sink it in hell-fire a hundred fathoms deep."

Rev. J. M. Green, of the City of Mexico, gives an account of the assassination of three Protestants in Ahuacuatlan, State of Guerrero. The victims were Rev. Abraham Gomez, a young Indian, ordained less than a year ago, Miguel Cipriano and the wife of Felipe Zaragoza, on Aug. 7. Father Vergara, the Catholic priest, in celebrating mass the day before urged his people to "make an example of the ministers of Satan" who had come among them, adding that they might "kill him" with all safety, counting upon his own protection and that of the chief of police. Vergara had been given the parish of Teloloapam by the Bishop of Guerrero, on condition that he would exterminate the Protestant congregations in all that region. "This was on Saturday. The following day at midnight, seven drunken women appeared in the Protestant quarter of the town and began to commit disorders, which seemed to deserve rebuke at the hands of the authorities, and Abraham with six of the brethren visited the judge and prosecuted their complaint. Strangely enough, the only reply given was the arrest and imprisonment of five of the brethren, and the dismissal of Abraham and of Felipe Zaragoza, who returned full of anxiety to the house of the latter. Very soon after the judge ordered the church bell to be rung, and thus gathered some 200 men and women in the court room, to whom he gave his instructions, and sent them forth on their bloody mission. Like infuriated savages they made their way at once to Zaragoza's house, and being unable to force the door, they tore up the roof, and with machete and pistols killed first Mrs. Zaragoza. Felipe seeing the danger of Abraham, ran to him and threw his arms about him, but was immediately torn away and disabled by a pistol-shot in the left arm. He was then stretched on the floor, and his Bible placed under his head as a pillow in derision. This done the ruffians turned to Abraham, who sat on the bed with his head resting on his hands, and dealt him a terrible blow with a machete, then he was shot with a pistol, and his poor mangled body, lifeless and bleeding, was dragged from the house out into the street and along the highway, receiving all sorts of indignities, being literally hacked to pieces with machetes."

The Independent having called attention to this bloody massacre, the Freeman of New York, an influential Catholic organ, replies thus:

"They (Protestant missionaries) are honest people trust in honor of the Annunciation and the Incarnation at the sound of the Angelus. The Bible, they say, will soon wipe out such 'superstition.' A light burns before an image of the Mother of God. 'Ha!' cries missionary, 'we shall soon teach the benighted to break that symbol!' And so on. If the killing of a few missionaries of this kind would keep others like them at home, we should almost—we Papists are so wicked!—be inclined to say: 'On with the dance; let joy be unconfined.'"

Persecution has, even in its extreme form, still to be endured for Christ's sake. Our watchful contemporary, Evangelical Christendom, makes mention of the Episcopal Methodist church at Vienna: "It has been established about three years, and has been doing a good work, pushing on the efforts for evangelization as far as its forces, spiritual and temporal, have permitted. However, a severe trial has overtaken it. In one month two of its members have been assassinated; and although these cruel deaths have been, indeed, only too terrible, they are not the only trials which have beset this young congregation. The increased virulence of the Romish persecution (for genuine persecution there is, in spite of the law guaranteeing full liberty of conscience and worship) causes the members to go about in fear of their lives."—Word and Work.

Rev. C. G. Moule repeats in the Record the painful story of the Papal persecution in Madeira, of Dr. Robert Kalley and the converts resulting from his labors, which issued in the expatriation of about one thousand persons. In a brief explanatory note Mr. Moule says:

"The writer, Major Freeman, who wrote it for the Lahore Church Gazette of March 8th, 1884, kindly allows me to make further use of it. For myself, I am deeply convinced both that the Romish Church is making immense and most skillful efforts to win England back, and that her essential principals are semper eadem. Meanwhile, great and strange is the indifference of Englishmen in general to the matter."

Although referring to events transpiring some years back, considerable present interest attaches from the fact that Rome is now making great strides. Rome is unchanging, and her triumph means assuredly the crushing down of all who venture to oppose.—Word and Work.

Pastor Thummel, of the Lutheran Church, in Prussia, who some time ago was sentenced to a fortnight's imprisonment for "insulting the Roman Catholic Church," and who was released by order of the Emperor after a week's confinement, has again been brought up at Everfield. With his publisher, he is charged with contempt of court, and with again insulting the Romish Church, by certain passages in a pamphlet. He has been sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, the publisher escaping with only two. One of the "insulting" remarks is to the effect that the Romish Apostasy is "built upon superstition and idolatry."—Messiah's Herald.

For many years past Rev. Mr. Doane, an American missionary, has been laboring most successfully in the Caroline Islands, and the light of Christianity has shown upon the natives. As soon as the Pope decided that the Islands belonged to Spain, the Spanish government sent out a man-of-war, six priests, and fifty soldiers. The priests at once set about annoying Mr. Doane, and finally sent him into prison when he refused to surrender the mission house to them. Mr. Doane protested in vain. The Islands belonged to Spain—the Pope had so decided, and no other religion but the Pope's could be tolerated there. After being kept in prison on board the men-of-war for two weeks, Mr. Doane was transferred to one of the islands where he was not allowed to communicate with his people. There was no ground for the arrest of Mr. Doane except that he refused to give up the property of the American mission.—Converted Catholic.

There are no Protestants in Quito, and none are allowed to reside in the city. Everything is tolerated but opposition to the Church, and he who will not partake of the sacrament is stoned.—Christian Evangelist.

How shall we define this golden attribute of mercy? Is it not the one perfection which we creatures give, or seem to give to our Creator? How could he have mercy were it not for us? Mercy is the tranquility of his omnipotence, and the sweetness of his omnipresence; the fruit of his eternity, and the compassion of his immensity; the chief satisfaction of his justice, the triumph of his wisdom, and the patient perseverance of his love. Wherever we go, there is mercy, the peaceful, active, broad, deep, endless mercy of our Heavenly Father. If we work by day, we work in mercy's light, and we sleep at night in the lap of our Father's mercy.—F. W. Faber.

WHO IS IT?

Who is it that lolls at ease while you toil from morning till night? The saloon-keeper.

Who is it that makes two hundred per cent. profit from what causes the misery and degradation of families and the woes of little children? The saloon-keeper.

Who is it who sets tempting food to draw you into his den, as a bait is set to lure a rat into a trap? The saloon-keeper.

Who is it that buys houses and lands, and struts in fine clothes, with the money which might have kept your family from being turned into the street, and from going in rags? The saloon-keeper.

Who is it that takes your last cent for his poisonous drinks, and shuts the door in the face of your wife when she asks credit for a five-cent loaf of bread? The saloon-keeper.

Who is it when your money and reputation are gone, and you have no friend left to pay for your drink, will take you by the collar and kick you into the gutter? The saloon-keeper.

Who is it robs you of sense and reason, puts you lower than brute beasts, drives you into jails and penitentiaries, and sends you to the gallows? The saloon-keeper.

Is this man who lives by crushing human hearts, the man you should delight to honor by placing him in office? Throw his chain off your neck, and shake his clutch from off your soul.—Union Signal.

Interesting Discoveries.

An interesting discovery has very recently been made in the direct line between Pompeii and Nocera. The digging of a well in a vineyard revealed the existence of a street of tombs, 100 feet east of the amphitheater of Pompeii. If the whole street is as closely lined with tombs as is the portion laid bare, it will be one of the most important discoveries lately made in that part of the world; but unfortunately money is wanting, so that the excavation is going on very slowly. Most of the tombs are covered with rude inscriptions painted in red, many of them being of the nature of advertisements, the tomb thus serving the purpose of a newspaper along the much-frequented road. The exact date has not yet been accurately ascertained, but they probably belong to the periods of Julius Cæsar and Tiberius. A contrast may be drawn between the condition of Pompeii and that of Pergamon, which, although double the size of Pompeii, has, thanks to the energy of the Prussian government, been laid clear within eight years. In the latter, beautiful, finely painted statutes, votive offering to Athena, and belonging to the sixth century B. C., have been found buried in the earth, and literally forming the foundation of the houses above. Their style of art is one hitherto not supposed possible at so remote a period, and they cause the ruins of Pompeii to appear quite modern. The discovery of an aqueduct which probably dates back to the time of King Solomon is reported from Jerusalem, and it is confidently anticipated that the further excavation of it will bring to light some extremely interesting and valuable inscriptions.

The Glory-Filled Earth.

You will find, as early as in Numbers xiv. 21, this word of promise: "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of Jehovah,"—not merely shall we see it outside the earth, through an open heaven, on the throne of God, but the earth itself filled with the glory of God! We know it has not yet been filled. It has been going on from bad to worse; but all the earth is to be filled with this same glory. We work for that glory; and if we work in any other way, or for any other motive, we are not in the mind of God. We are looking for the whole earth to be filled with the glory of Jehovah; but that time "cannot come till the glory come": book; and there is no glory but in the face of Jesus Christ; and until the face of Jesus Christ is seen, the glory of Jehovah cannot fill this earth.—Dr. W. P. Mackay.

In reading the four Gospels I am ever more and more impressed with this fact: That the language ascribed to Jesus not only occasionally asserts his possession of authority far above that of Hebrew prophets and Grecian philosophers, but that it very frequently, undesignedly, betrays his ever-present consciousness that God was dwelling in him, and giving him dignity, authority and power which had not, at that time, ever entered into any other heart to conceive. It is this which has in those rare hours when my soul has fallen into deep darkness, made the entrance of his Word give a light above that of the sun.—Thos. Hill.

THE HOUSE OF GOD.

"EVERY HOUSE IS BUILT BY SOME ONE."

It is generally understood by the most of us that God is now selecting and fitting up material for the erection of a building that will answer the design of the great Architect who arranged the plan and purpose of the same before the world began. And it is as generally admitted that that house when erected will be used for the benefit of some of the human family. But there is a diversity of opinion as to how many of our lost race will at last find shelter under its spacious roof.

Some argue that the building when completed will benefit those only who are used as material in the building. This view confers but little honor on the builder. Others compare the human family to a forest of which God is selecting a few of the best sticks of which he intends to build his beautiful and glorious temple, and the surplus of this great forest is no more to the builder than the scaffolding is to the building, and we are exhorted by those holding that view to have no sympathy with the balance of this useless lumber. I would ask in all humility and charity, how does this view accord with the word of him who had authority to speak?

"The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Luke xix. 10. None can doubt that the human family are all lost in sin and death, the crooked as well as the straight sticks. And who dare question the ability of the Son of man to accomplish what he came to do. And the Scriptures teach that Jesus is the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world; and "he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." John i. 29; 1 John ii. 2. Again, in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established. A third witness testifieth, "All things are of God who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation, to-wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation." 2 Cor. v. 18, 19.

From the above statements we might reasonably conclude that God places a higher estimate upon lost sinners, and the world at large, than our dear Brother who of late exhorts us by saying, "Let us bear no false sympathy for the scaffolding; it served its purpose with the architect, and now let it perish." Again the same writer introduces a beautiful illustration of the human family, in which he compares them to "the falling bloom from a tree, and the ripe fruit when gathered." But his application seems to me unwarranted. He says, "What has led to the false sympathy for millions that bear the same relation to God's plan that the surplus bloom of the fruit tree bears to the full developed and perfect fruit that golden autumn pours into the lap of the husbandman?"

It is true indeed that a large per cent. of the human family fall into the embrace of our common enemy, death, while in the bloom of childhood and youth, while few arrive to mature age. But will the above application bear the test of the word of truth? Infants were brought to Jesus who said "suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." Luke xviii. 15, 16. Matthew and Mark add their testimony that the statement is true.

From the foregoing we must conclude that the master of the house places a higher estimate on the falling bloom of our race than our brother seems to, unless death separates his sympathy from those he came to save. Others assume "that God has no use for idiots and scrofulous babies in his kingdom." Jesus while here demonstrated his sympathy for the most repulsive and loathsome specimens of humanity, by taking time in the midst of all the urgent calls for help, to cure the leper, Mark i. 35-42.

I am thankful that a heart has been given me to feel and faith to believe that even scrofulous and weak-minded children are still the objects of compassion with our tender and sympathetic Shepherd. And that "Jesus Christ, yesterday and today is the same, and for the ages." Diaglott trans. Heb. xiii. 8.

Our esteemed brother cites for proof of his position, "Behold, the nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balances. This is no proof that God has not forces in reserve sufficient to gather the drop and the dust, and utilize them in his own due time. Jesus had plenty of help to gather the fragments, which were many, after feeding the multitude with the few loaves.

When the time comes that "The Lord of hosts shall have swallowed up death, and that there shall be no more death," Isa. xxv. 6-8; Rev. xxi. 4, then comes the feast of fat things, and the time for the removing of the "vail that is spread over all nations." The material for God's house having been prepared, and gathered, will be cemented together in love, as one body." And the roof will be large enough to accommodate the lost, wandering prodigal who has spent his money in riotous, or fast living; hungry and naked he will come to his mind or to himself, and return to the father's house. (That house must be erected first.) There he will be received joyfully by every member of the house (except his older brother who seems disposed to find fault), and he will be well clothed and fed. This will be a merry time and a consummation worthy of him who has all power in heaven and earth. (No doubt the Father will manage to reconcile his elder son after a while, although he may refuse to go in and enjoy the festivities of the occasion. J. D. S.

BIBLE LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.

Lesson 11.

REPENTANCE.

Golden Text: "And the times of this ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent." Acts 17, 30.

Answer. Because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness. Acts 17, 31.

Q. What did Jesus tell those persons who told him of the Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices?

A. Except ye repent ye shall likewise perish? Luke 13, 3.

Q. What did Jesus preach to the people after he heard John was in prison?

A. From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Matt. 4, 17; Mark 1, 15.

Q. What did John the Baptist do and preach in the wilderness?

A. John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. Mark 1, 4.

Q. What did Peter say to them that asked what they should do?

A. Repent and be baptised, every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. Acts 2, 38.

Q. If it was necessary in the days of the apostles to repent and be baptised, is the command yet binding?

A. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off; even as many as the Lord our God shall call. Acts 2, 39.

Q. Why is it necessary for all to repent and be converted?

A. See Acts 3, 19-23.

In summing up we find the following:

1. That God commands all men to repent.

2. Because God will judge in righteousness.

3. Except we repent we shall perish.

4. We find that Jesus taught repentance.

5. We find that John the Baptist taught repentance for remission of sins.

6. That Peter taught that repentance and baptism were necessary in order to remission of sins.

7. We find that the command came to all that are called.

8. We find that all that will not hear Jesus will be destroyed.

9. That God is not willing that any should perish, but wants all to come to repentance.

10. That it is the goodness of God that leads to repentance.

11. That it is necessary to pay attention to the word of God, and not let it slip from us.

12. Finally, if we expect to receive a crown of life, when God shall send Jesus Christ to restore all things which God had spoken of by the prophets, we must repent, or reform our lives in accordance with his will and keep his commands and then he will accept of us when he comes to reign.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "8" and reads "Jay8" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1888. "Feb" February, "Mar" March "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January, "Jan" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

GET WISDOM.—To Keva.

Pleasure is fleeting and beauty vain,
And hollow and empty is worldly fame,
The love and friendships of earth go by,
Its glory fades and its bright things die.

Whatever we seek, be it knowledge or gold,
Though strive we hard in our hands to hold,
Must be laid at the tomb's cold brink adown,
And ourselves be lost to the world's renown.

Then Keva seek in thy youth's fair hours
To crown thy brow with the deathless flowers,
Blossoms of wisdom that upward spring
In the garden of peace where the angels sing.

No ruby brought from the distant mine
Can give such grace to that brow of thine,
Naught else so lovely on earth be found,
Of shell or pearl in the ocean's round.

Wisdom can keep from the paths of sin,
Through the gates of pearl she can lead thee in;
Exalt her now and beyond the tears
She shall set thee high in the endless years.

Get wisdom, then, 'tis the principal thing,
Most precious strain that my pen may ring;
For life is held in her happy hand,
And a crown and home in an Eden land.

THE FIRE OF GOD'S ANGER.

Some few weeks ago we received from the author, L. O. Baker, a Vol. of nearly 300 pages bearing the above title. The author is a Presbyterian Clergyman residing in Philadelphia, and author also of another work that has attracted considerable attention from its unique theological teachings, entitled—The Mystery of Creation and of Man. The author's style is forcible, impressive, and often beautiful and sublime. As the best means of giving our readers some definite idea of the Vol., so lately sent us, we place an entire chapter before them under its appropriate heading as follows:—

ETERNAL FIRE A FACT OF SCIENCE AS WELL AS OF SCRIPTURE.

We have thus far examined the Scriptural use of the term "Eternal fire" and its cognates sufficiently to determine,

1. The one radical idea, common to them all, is that of destruction.

2. The term comprehends and is the exponent of all the agencies by which the consuming energy of Nature wastes and destroys the bodies and souls of men.

Thoughtful men have long been waiting for some statement of the doctrine of future punishment which should be scientific as well as Scriptural. If we are not yet able to arrive at this, we may at least indicate the direction in which it may be found.

Our primary source of knowledge upon this subject is the Holy Scriptures. But its interpreters have too often forgotten that God has revealed himself to men in other ways than through his word. As man was made in his image, no conception of God's government of the world can command permanent assent which violates what he has revealed of himself in man and in the constitution of human society. And as all things were made by him, nothing can be true which does not accord with what he has made known of himself in the system of creation. The mistake of Theology has been in its too exclusive view of God as the moral governor of the world, and of man as his subject. Whereas man is also the product of a created system of which God is the Author, and the subject of natural as well as of moral law. His plan and destiny in this system of nature needs to be studied before we can appreciate the Bible terms which define his destiny as a subject of God's moral government. We therefore pause here to inquire whether there is anything in nature corresponding to the Bible doctrine that sinful men must be cast into eternal fire. The observations of science convince us that the primary condition of the elemental substances out of which all created forms have been built up, was one in which their atoms were held apart by great heat. The visible universe is for the most part a wilderness of fire. The nearest star to us in space is the sun, a vast incandescent globe of fire, in whose photosphere vaporous masses of iron and sodium, and other minerals are glowing with intensest heat. On the earth these same substances have been cooled down, and have combined according to their chemical affinities. In this process of combination the heat-energy has been rendered latent. There has been a progress in the creative process from the state of primeval fire, to one of chemical combination and equilibrium, and cosmical order, by which these elements have become subordinated to the ends and uses of Life. Two antagonistic forces seem to have been contending for the mastery on this arena of the universe, the eternal fire and the eternal life. The fire resolves all things into their primary elements. It is constantly claiming back the things that have been wrung out of its bosom. All processes of decay are but the slower gnawing of the tooth of this eternal fire. Life, however, has been from the first capturing and subsidising these substances to the ends of its manifestation. Under its transforming power they are organized into a variety of creature forms, advancing from one stage of development to another, until finally man has appeared at the summit of the series, the highest embodiment of created life. It has been from the first, however, a law of creation that all defective forms of creature life cannot abide. They are but transient and must give way to higher forms. There has been a constant struggle in nature toward a perfect and abiding form, but it has not yet been reached. Type after type, race after race, has been suffered to sink back into the womb of the eternal fire out of which they were brought forth. But along all the series the abiding life has been conserving the fruits of past triumphs and making new conquests. Still, however, it remains the law of nature that all defective forms of life must yield to the law of decay and go back to the elemental abyss out of which they sprang. And to this law man is no exception. He exists as yet only in a sinful and imperfect type of manhood. And therefore he is made subject to vanity, and is under bondage to this law of corruption. He must depart into the eternal fire.

The eternal life, however, has at length been manifested in the person of the perfect Man. It was "with the Father" from the beginning, and has now been "manifested unto us." 1 Jno. i. 1, 2. The man-nature in Christ has reached its ideal as the perfect and indestructible image of God, the depository and vehicle of his life, the representative of his authority, the inheritor and administrator of his vast estate. As such, Jesus is now triumphant over death and all the powers of the universe, crowned Lord over all. It is not then only in obedience to the requirements of a moral law, but also to the law of nature, that sinful men are consigned to the eternal fire, and that only those who, by faith in Christ are made partakers of his nature, enter into the eternal life. This is no arbitrary sentence of an irate Judge. It is according to the eternal law of nature. We have already seen that the term "fire" stands in Scripture as the representative of all the death-dealing forces of nature. In them all God is seen as a "consuming fire." We have also here to notice that a wide generalization of the passages in Scripture which refer to angelic powers, convinces us that they are either closely identified, if not identical, with what we call the forces of nature. They are the executive forces of the one Supreme force in Creation. And as it is these forces which draw men down into the abyss of dissolution which, in this economy of nature, may be viewed as its gulph of eternal fire, it is in their agency that we find the proper explanation of the angels which attend the administration of the Son of Man. They "gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity and cast them into a furnace of fire." Matt xiii. 41, 42. And they are the angels of his might who shall attend him at his revelation from heaven in flaming fire. 2 Thess. i. 8. The language of Scripture also accords with science in assuming that there are two classes of forces in the realm of nature, the one life-giving, the other death-dealing. There are two classes of effects, and it there are not to be referred to two classes of agencies, the one constructive, the other destructive, there must be at least an essential difference in the mode of operation when the forces of nature transcend the sphere of beneficent action, and become the ministers of evil, and of death, without, however, seeking to penetrate this mystery, which is beyond our ken, it is sufficient to know that the common language of both science and Scripture recognizes these two realms of cosmic forces, in one of which the energy of nature is directed toward the production of order out of chaos, of light out of darkness, of life out of death. And in the other its energy is bent to produce the counter class of effects, resounding to darkness and chaos, dissolving the elements that had combined to the production of forms of life and beauty, breaking down organisms, and carrying down into the vortex of dissolution the creature forms which life had built up, and beautified out of the substances it had rescued from their grasp. Now, as the angels of light are identified in Scripture with these beneficent operations, so on the other hand it has a name for these destructive and death-dealing forces. It calls them "the devil and his angels," "the ruler," "the kingdom of darkness." It has been a great mistake to regard these evil powers as operating against man in the sphere of moral agency alone. They are more truly and deeply his physical enemies. They have the power of disease, Luke x. 19; xi. 14–18; xiii. 16; Acts x. 38, and of death, Heb. ii. 14. The devil is a prince over all death-dealing forces in nature, Job. i. 12–19; Psa. lxxiii. 49; Ephes. ii. 2; vi. 12. The difference between the Scriptural and the scientific conception of these forces is that the former always views them as living spiritual agents. But ever here science is gradually approaching the Scriptural conception. Herbert Spencer admits that the final postulate of science, the omnipresent, inscrutable, unknowable Force may be living and spiritual. Why may not all minor forces in this created system be also living powers? Indeed we were not long ago assured by an able writer upon the "Fallacy of Materialism," that "the theory that the universe consists entirely of mind stuff," and that "mental and physical phenomena, although apparently diverse, are really identical, is the one toward which all the greatest minds that have studied this question in the right way are tending." There is one sublime luminous truth, however, revealed in Scripture, which is beyond the province of science. And that is that the author and energizer of this created system is diverting all its forces, not only to the preparation of it as an abode for the highest forms of life, but toward its ultimate transformation and deliverance from the yoke of these evil powers that have wrought in it this work of corruption and death, Rom. viii. 19–23; Rev. v. 13; xxii. 1–5. The "Eternal fire," which is the concrete expression of all these devouring agencies of nature, must finally consume them all in its own bosom. For we read that it is "prepared for the devil and his angels," Matt. xxv. 4; Rev. xx. 10–14. The death-dealing forces contain within themselves the principles of self destruction. The whole realm of death and hell, with the "devil and his angels" must be "cast into the lake of fire." And the Scripture term for this fate is "destruction." 1 Cor. xv. 24–26; Heb. ii. 14. "There shall be no more death," Rev. xxi. 4. But although science halts here, where Scriptures advances with firm tread and lifts the veil, there is yet complete accord in what both teach as to the pit of dissolution which nature, or rather the God of nature, has dug for all the imperfect forms of created life which have heretofore appeared, and which contain within themselves the principle of decay and death. And the natural man, as belonging to the same system, must depart, under the common curse, into the eternal fire. The sentence of the Son of Man, Matt. xxv. 41,—"Depart ye cursed," is as truly a sentence of the law of Nature as it is of the law of God. Only one Man has as yet appeared in whom the eternal life was so manifested as to enable him to rise above and out of this pit of death into the glory of a divine and immortal manhood. Union with him, by faith, is the only power of life that can save our lives from destruction and redeem us out of all the hands of our enemies. It is true only of those in whom this purifying and conserving life-power dwells, that they "go into life eternal." It is manifest therefore, that before we can arrive at any true doctrine of future or present punishment for sin, we must learn to view man in his relations to this natural system in which God has placed him, of which he is a product and with whose destiny his own is involved. The fire of hell is not merely a future torment of the mind. The Scripture terms are too literal for this. Nor, on the other hand, is it a gulf of flame specially created for the endless torment in body and soul of lost men. It is a present fact of nature a fact the proofs of which are all around us, and the signs of whose activity are everywhere in nature apparent; yea, even in our own bodies and souls, depraving, blighting, and consuming. We walk each day along the edge of this bottomless pit. Each night we go to sleep upon the confines of this outer darkness. The fire that burns in our very life blood is a shred of this eternal fire. The vices that feint and inflame it, that blight the bodies of men and consume their energies of soul are but the outer lappings of the billows that toss on this lake of fire and beat themselves on these shores of life whereon we tread for a few brief years. And the yawning gulf of this sea of raging forces and of elemental unrest waits to receive us all. The cry of even Jesus, in presence of it, was, "Save me, oh God; for the waters are come into my soul. I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing; I am come into deep waters where the floods overflow me.....Let me not sink....neither let the deep swallow me up, and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me.....Draw nigh unto my soul and redeem it; deliver me because of mine enemies." Ps. lxxix. With such "strong crying and tears" did even this Divine Man offer up prayers and supplications unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared. Heb. v. 7. We must, therefore, open our minds to take in this full and Scriptural significance of death, the appointed wages of sin, if we would understand the Scripture terms which set forth its punishment. The meaning of death in God's economy of nature and of moral government, has been strangely perverted by a Satanic perpetuation in the minds of men of the original lie "Ye shall not surely die." Men have believed themselves of an immortal nature apart from God. And hence the real significance of the death-sentence has been missed, and also the real value of the gospel record that God hath given us eternal life in his Son. We need, therefore, to know that all these Scripture terms, "Gehenna," the "hell of fire," "Eternal fire" the "Fire that cannot be quenched," all pertaining to this realm of death and dissolution, and describe to us the pit, which not only the law of God, but the law of nature, has dug for the sin-blighted bodies and souls of men. It is not to a realm of endless torment, but to an abyss of inexorable dissolution, protracted indeed beyond the death of the body, for the soul, as a finer essence of Man's being, is longer in its dying to which wicked men are consigned. And even the righteous, as to their flesh and blood nature, which is but carnal, and must see corruption, do not escape this pit.

It is only as they are made partakers of the divine nature, and become in life and spirit identified with it, that they "go into life eternal." This is the profoundest teaching of the scene in Matt. xxv. 31–41. Their life in manhood has become incorporate with the life of the Divine Man. And so they go with him into his kingdom of joy and into life eternal. But here again, this doom of the wicked, and of this we cannot be reminded too often, is immediate, and lies on this side of the resurrection. The eternal fire is a present fact. It pertains to this present economy of nature. This, indeed, is the real significance of the adjective which describes it. It is the aionion, the age-during fire. It pertains specially to this order of nature and not to the ages to come. Its power then will be gone, and there shall be no more curse nor death. Rev. xxii. 3. It is therefore a present Son of Man, now exalted to Headship over all the forces of the universe—Eph. i. 20–23—, seated on the throne of an ever-present judgment, and executing the law of this present system of nature, whose voice we are to hear in the dread sentence, "Depart ye cursed into eternal fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." This is the consignment, not of a future host of resurrected dead, who are not here in view, but of the living generations of unrighteous men, to that present abyss of dissolution which yawns beneath us all as a gulf of consuming fire. It is from this now-impending peril that his gospel is sent out with its glad tidings of rescue. Its gift of eternal life is the antidote to this death. And so great is the power of life now deposited in the new source of Life to men, that "power has been given to him over all flesh" to give not only eternal life to a chosen seed who are to be associated with him in his life-giving work, John xvii. 2, but also to raise up out of the abyss of death to lower orders of life (each in his own time and order), the masses of mankind who have gone down into this pit. Jno. v. 28, 29. Their resurrection, although it be to judgment and corrective discipline, is yet the result of his redeeming work and a manifestation of his triumphant power. And it violates the whole order of God's working in the plan of creation, and the whole spirit and meaning of his Word in its dealings with these great problems of life and death, to view this recovery of the unjust dead, as anything but a blessing, even though it bring new risks with the new opportunities of life.

Moreover this view of God's gracious purpose to recover men from the abyss of eternal fire into which they are cast by the law of nature, as well as by the sentence of the Son of Man, is necessary to show how his goodness answers to his severity. The eternal fire is not a master in this universe, only a servant. The devil was no triumphs that are not turned into defeat by him who was manifested to destroy him and his works. No! even death can hold its trophies. "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." And death and hell shall be cast into the lake of fire. Rev. xx. 14. There is, indeed, before sinful men a fearful punishment. It is no light thing to die and sink down, body and soul, into that abyss where burns the eternal dissolving fire. It is no small privation to be shut out from the light and life and blessedness of those of whom Jesus says, "They shall never taste of death," "I give unto them eternal life." Jno. viii. 52; x. 28. And wicked men, when raised, must still be adjudged unworthy of this life. And yet their recovery will prove the truth of what the book of Creation and the book of God both teach, that the eternal life is master of the realm of eternal fire, that Love is stronger than wrath. To take away every element of hope from the resurrection of all but the small class, who now receive Christ, is to limit his grace and power as the Prince of Life, and to deny that his gospel is glad tidings of great joy to all people.

Omissions Annul Conclusions.

"The Papacy and the man of sin not identical." Of course not. Identical signifies the same. The first, papacy, is feminine, and the word for its symbol is "the woman—the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." Rev. xvii.

"The man of sin" is, of course, masculine, and so is not "the woman!" Easy to be seen.

"The woman" rides "the beast that carried her!" Hence the rider on the beast is not the beast she rode upon. All easy to see.

The pronoun applied to the beast is "he, him; Rev. xiii. 5–8; in Dan vii. It is "he, his;" in Dan. viii. "the ram, he-goat, and horn that waxed exceeding great," are masculine in both noun and pronoun. Thus, the name and nature, the official position and administration, were not identical. Please note the profound mistake as to personification, also.

The assertion is that "if words have meaning, these words designate an individual," a personal antichrist. 2 Thess. ii. But that depends on the sense, the subject and limitations in which the author uses them!

Observe, Moses hath in every city them that preach him, being read every Sabbath." Acts xv. 21. These personal terms embrace the Mosaic system of government teaching and order of worship! That system is Moses personified!

Paul preached Christ. He preached the gospel unto them. Here these terms have a dispensational sense, and not one of mere verbal and personal import, confined to Paul.

Thou art this head of gold. Dan. ii. 38; (and this was misused when arguing to confine it to a person; the symbol, golden head, embraced all Babylonia).

If this does not suffice, take Dan. iv. 22. "It is thou, O King,"—personified by the great tree—its height reached to heaven, and the sight to the end of all the earth!

Please do yourself the justice to count a few of like import, and applied to the symbolic word. These great beasts, which are four, are four kings (symbol terms—analogous to Nebuchadnezzar) that shall arise out of the earth." Dan. vii. 17.

In this sense "Tyre" was addressed at length by Ezekiel, xxvii. 3, and Gog, xxxviii. "Prophesy against him!"

As I count, the personal pronouns, "she, her," etc., are used of "Babylon the Great," the mother of harlots, over fifty times in one chapter. Rev. xviii. Then, "the man of sin" is "he," etc., the precise correlative of "the mother of harlots"—all know that the husband is correlative to wife!

To climb and crown this climax of prophetic teaching, note that the symbols and their geography, chronology, and history of fulfilment, even into our generation, "the time of the end," forbid another, a 2nd or double evil accomplishment. "The antichrist" was then and is yet awaiting his doom. Dan. vii. 23–26.

It is passing strange that any hair of promise should argue out a future and more baleful form of feminine or masculine anti-dominion! They've about had their day, now the Lord's day seems due! Even "the wise men" announce "the star of Bethlehem" this year! Amen. Lovingly for truth and grace.

J. B. COOK.

P. S. To my apprehension it is not in the nature of faith or hope to look for the greatest evil! No, indeed. The gospel addresses itself especially to faith and hope! Hence this, in its very nature tends to allay fear. Its the rejection of provided and promised blessing that brings fear. Then the notion of a future antichrist originated in and for Rome, the seat of the beast. It turned the thought of "anti-christ" on to the Protestant counsel Bishop Walmsley of the Roman Church assigned "the key," Rev. ix., to Luther, who he says "opened hell!" To this he ascribes Luther's heated zeal, and he argued out the end of Protestantism in 1835–1838—over 52 years ago!

But all prophecy of overpowering evil belongs to and in Rome, where all Gentile power of darkness, desolation and oppression centered. Of course it must have come through the Papacy, as that has been the great controlling form of Roman administration and persecution that followed the Pagan (with variations) through near 1500 years!

Rome represented by the 4th beast antedates the Christian era. It has been the treading down power, Dan. ix. 26–27, viii. 9–11; and is to go with its blatant "horn" to "the judgment written." Rev. xvii. to xix. The prophecy was foretold history straight on to the end of Gentile times in judgment, preparatory to "the restitution of all things spoken." Rev. xxi. 15.

Notes by the Way.

I closed my last when I reached Brother Brown's at Sac City. From there I made my way across the country by means of a livery team to Bro. Ketchum's, a distance of about twenty-two miles, and was received into their kind hospitality. Brother and Sister Ketchum seem to be sound in the faith. From there I was furthered on by Brother Ketchum to the neighborhood where my sons live. Made them a short visit and was conveyed by one of them to the place of meeting of the brethren in Fairchild. This brings us to Friday evening, Sept. 9th. There we were met again by Brother Eychaner, who came to help us in this meeting. Brother Eychaner opened the meeting by introducing the things of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the anointed. The meeting was continued until Sunday night, when two persons manifested a desire to be baptized. On Monday morning we repaired to the water, and by this time three more had made up their minds to follow the Savior and we baptized five willing souls into the all-saving name of Jesus. Brother Eychaner did most of the preaching. Monday night we held our last meeting in this place and after a most interesting and heart-cheering sermon from Brother Eychaner we commemorated the death and sufferings of our blessed Lord. We then sung, "In the sweet by and by, we shall meet on that beautiful shore."

Thus closed a meeting of as deep interest as we have witnessed for many a day. We then took the parting hand. Tuesday Brother Eychaner took the train for his home, and in company with Brother W. H. Garton, I started on my journey. Brother Garton brought us to Gonda Station, on the Illinois Central Railroad. There we took the train to Jessup and stopped off with the express purpose of visiting Sister Craton, widow of Brother George Craton, with whom many of the readers of THE RESTITUTION were so well and favorably known. We learned that Sister Craton had just been moved to her son's, her health failing her so that it was not thought safe for her to live any longer alone; hence they moved her to live with her son, Dr. Milton Craton, who is well and favorably know in and around Jessup, both as a man and a physician. His place of residence being four miles from Jessup, I did not see Sister Craton. I stopped over night in Jessup and took the 7:50 train to Independence, there changed to the Chicago, Burlington & Northern R. R., and came to Walker, where I was met and conveyed to the place of meeting, this being Sept. 16.

We commenced our meeting by introducing the things of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus, the anointed, and continued the meetings till Sunday night, when two persons manifested a desire to be baptized. On Monday morning we repaired to the water, and by this time three more had made up their minds to follow the Savior and we baptized them into the name of Christ for the remission of sins. Monday night we closed our meeting in this place. This is a new place and much interest is manifested. Hope we may be able to visit them again in the future.

This closed our meetings in Iowa. We start this morning for Jo Davis Co., Ill. Thus we have spent four Sundays in Iowa, held four meetings, baptized twelve persons into the Christ, and had a most enjoyable and refreshing time. And now let me express my thanks to the kind brethren and friends who furthered me on my way by their financial aid and may the God of peace keep and preserve them unto his heavenly kingdom. Amen.

T. J. WHITCHETT.

DEAR SISTER.

[Thoughts on visiting my sister's grave, Oct. 15th, 1887, St. Joseph, Mo.]

I've come to bid thy resting place
Perhaps a long farewell,
Dear sister,—But my own heart knows
The thoughts that in it swell,
As I think perhaps it is the last
On earth I ere shall see
Of the sacred spot where thou dost sleep,
From all earth's troubles free.

Full well I know that soon shall break
The day that knows no night,
That from thy slumbers thou shalt wake
Robed in immortal light;
That though to far off lands I go
Our parting wont be long;
The life eternal we shall know,
And join redemption's song.
With all the ransomed hosts we'll swell
The everlasting song,
And while the endless cycles tell,
The harmony prolong.

Then farewell to thy quiet grave,
My sister ever dear,
I'll trust in him who died to save
For he is ever near.
He will sustain in every hour,
He will my portion be:
I'll trust in him who has the power,
From death to set us free.

Selections.

One of the greatest obstacles to living unwaveringly the interior life, is the difficulty of seeing God in everything. People say, "I can easily submit to things which come from God; but I can not submit to man, and most of the trials and crosses come through human instrumentality." Or they say, "It is all well enough to talk of trusting; but when I commit a matter to God, man is sure to come in and disarrange it all, and while I have no difficulty in trusting God, I do see serious difficulties in the way of trusting man."

This is no imaginary trouble, but it is of vital importance, and if it can not be met, does really make the life of faith an impossible and visionary theory. For nearly everything in life comes to us through human instrumentalities, and most of our trials are the result of somebody's failure, or ignorance, or carelessness, or sin. We know God can not be the author of these things, and yet unless he is the agent in the matter, how can we say to him about it, "Thy will be done?"

Besides, what good is there in trusting our affairs to God, if, after all, man is to be allowed to come in and disarrange them; and how is it possible to live by faith, if human agencies, in whom it would be wrong and foolish to trust, are to have a predominant influence in moulding our lives?

Moreover, things in which we can see God's hand always have a sweetness in them which consoles while it wounds. But the trials inflicted by man are full of bitterness.

What is needed, then, is to see God in everything, and to receive everything directly from his hands, with no intervention of second causes. And it is just to this that we must be brought, before we can know an abiding experience of entire abandonment and perfect trust. Our abandonment must be to God, not to man, and our trust must be in him, not in any arm of flesh, or we shall fail at the first trial.

The question here confronts us at once—"But is God in everything, and have we any warrant from the Scripture for receiving everything from his hands, without regarding the second causes which may have been instrumental in bringing it about?" I answer to this, unhesitatingly, Yes! To the children of God everything comes directly from their Father's hand, no matter who or what may have been the apparent agents. There are no "second causes" for them.

The whole teaching of the Scripture asserts and implies this. "Not a sparrow falls to the ground without our Father. The very hairs of our head are all numbered." We are not to be careful about anything, because our Father cares for us. We are not to avenge ourselves because our Father has charged himself with our defence. We are not to fear, for the Lord is on our side. No one can be against us, because he is for us. We shall not want, for he is our Shepherd. When we pass through the rivers they shall not overflow us, and when we walk through the fire we all not be burned, because he will be with us. He shuts the mouths of lions, that they can not hurt us. "He delivereth and rescueth." "He changeth the times and the seasons; he removeth kings and setteth up kings." A man's heart is in his hand, and, "as the rivers of water, he turneth it whithersoever he will." He ruleth over all the kingdoms of the heathen; and in his hand there is power and might, "so that none is able to withstand" him. "He ruleth the raging of the sea; when the waves thereof arise he stilleth them." He "bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought; he maketh the devices of the people of none effect." "Whatsoever the Lord pleaseth, that does he in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and all deep places."

"If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter; for he that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they."

"Lo, these are a part of his ways; but how little a portion is heard of him? But the thunder of his power who can understand?" "Hast thou not known, hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary? There is no searching of his understanding."

And this "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled; though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof." "I will say of the Lord he is my refuge and my fortress, my God, in him will I trust. Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust. His truth shall be thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day, nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee." "Because thou has made the Lord, which is my refuge, even the Most High thy habitation, there shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling. For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways."

To my own mind, these Scriptures, and many others like them, settle for ever the question as to the power of second causes in the life of the children of God. They are all under the control of our Father, and nothing can touch us except with his knowledge, and by his permission. It may be the sin of man that originates the action, and therefore the thing itself can not be said to be the will of God; but by the time it reaches us, it has become God's will for us, and must be accepted as directly from his hands. No man or company of men, no power in earth or heaven, can touch that soul which is abiding in Christ, without first passing through him, and receiving the seal of his permission. If God is for us, it matters not who may be against us; nothing can disturb or harm us, except he shall see that it is best for us, and still stand aside to let it pass.

An earthly parent's care for his helpless child is a feeble illustration of this. If the child is in its father's arms, nothing can touch it without that father's consent, unless he is too weak to prevent it. And even if this should be the case, he suffers the harm first in his own person, before he allows it to reach his child. And if an earthly parent would thus care for his little helpless one, how much more will our Heavenly Father, whose love is infinitely greater, and whose strength and wisdom can never be baffled? I am afraid there are some, even of God's own children, who scarcely think he is equal to themselves in tenderness, and love, and thoughtful care; and who, in their secret thoughts, charge him with a neglect and indifference of which they would feel themselves incapable. The truth really is, that his care is infinitely superior to any possibilities of human care; and that he who counts the very hairs of our heads, and suffers not a sparrow to fall without him, takes note of the minutest matters that can affect the lives of his little children, and regulates them all according to his own sweet will, let their origin be what they may.

The instances of this are numberless. Take Joseph. What could have seemed more apparently on the face of it to be the result of sin, and utterly contrary to the will of God, than his being sold into slavery? And yet Joseph in speaking of it said, "As for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good." "Now, therefore, be not grieved nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither; for God did send me before you to preserve life." To the eye of sense it was surely Joseph's wicked brethren who had sent him into Egypt, and yet Joseph, looking at it with the eye of faith, could say, "God sent me." It had been undoubtedly a grievous sin in his brethren, but, by the time it had reached Joseph, it had become God's will for him, and was in truth, though at first it did not look so, the greatest blessing of his whole life. And thus we see how the Lord can make even the wrath of man to praise him, and how all things, even the sins of others, shall work together for good to them that love him.

I learned this lesson practically and experimentally long years before I knew the Scriptural truth concerning it. I was attending a prayer-meeting held for the promotion of Scriptural holiness, when a strange lady rose to speak, and I looked at her wondering who she could be, little thinking she was to bring a message to my soul which would teach me such a grand lesson. She said she had great difficulty in living the life of faith, on account of the second causes that seemed to her to control nearly everything that concerned her. Her perplexity became so great that at last she began to ask God to teach her the truth about it, whether he was really in everything or not. After praying this for a few days, she had what she described as a vision. She thought she was in a perfectly dark place, and that there advanced towards her from a distance a body of light, which gradually surrounded and enveloped her and everything around her. As it approached, a voice seemed to say, "This is the presence of God—this is the presence of God." While surrounded with this presence, all the great and awful things in life seemed to pass before her—fighting armies, wicked men, raging beasts, storms and pestilences, sin and suffering of every kind. She shrank back at first in terror, but she soon saw that the Presence of God so surrounded and enveloped each one of these, that not a lion could reach out its paw, nor a bullet fly through the air, except as his presence moved out of the way to permit it. And she saw, that let there be ever so thin a sheet, as it were, of this glorious presence between herself and the most terrible violence, not a hair of her head could be ruffled, nor anything touch her, unless the presence divided to let the evil through. Then all the small and annoying things of life passed before her, and equally she saw that these also were so enveloped in this presence of God, that not a cross look, nor a harsh word, nor petty trial of any kind, could reach her unless his presence moved out of the way to let it.

Her difficulty vanished. Her question was answered for ever. God was in everything; and to her henceforth there were no second causes. She saw that her life came to her day by day and hour by hour directly from his hand, let the agencies which should seem to control it be what they might. And never again had she found any difficulty in an abiding consent to his will, and an unwavering trust in his care.

If we look at the seen things, we shall not be able to understand the secret of this. But the children of God are called to look "not at the things which are seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal." Could we but see with our bodily eyes his unseen forces surrounding us on every side, we would walk through this world in an impregnable fortress, which nothing could ever overthrow or penetrate, for "the angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them."

We have a striking illustration of this in the history of Elisha. The King of Syria was warring against Israel, but his evil designs were continually frustrated by the prophet, and at last he sent his army to the prophet's own city for the express purpose of taking him captive. We read, "He sent thither horses, and chariots, and a great host: and they came by night, and compassed the city about." This was the seen thing. And the servant of the prophet, whose eyes had not yet been opened to see the unseen things, was alarmed. And we read, "And when the servant of the man of God was risen early, and gone forth, behold an host encompassed the city, both with horses and chariots. And his servant said unto him, Alas, my master! how shall we do?" But his master could see the unseen things, and he replied, "Fear not, for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." And then he prayed, saying, "Lord, I pray Thee, open his eyes that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha."

The presence of God is the fortress of his people. Nothing can withstand it. At his presence the wicked perish; the earth trembles; the hills melt like wax; the cities are broken down; "the heavens also dropped, and Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God." And in the secret of his presence he has promised to hide his people from the pride of man, and from the strife of tongues. "My presence shall go with thee," he says, "and I will give thee rest."

I wish it were only possible to make every Christian see this truth as plainly as I see it. For I am convinced it is the only clue to a completely restful life. Nothing else will enable a soul to live only in the present moment as we are commanded to do, and to take no thought for the morrow. Nothing else will take all the risks and "suppose" out of a Christian's life, and enable him to say, "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life." Abiding in God's presence we run no risks. And such a soul can triumphantly say—

"I know not what it is to doubt,
My heart is always gay:
I run no risks, for, come what will,
God always has his way!"

I once heard of a poor colored woman, who earned a precarious living by daily labor, but who was a joyous triumphant Christian. "Ah, Nancy," said a gloomy Christian lady to her one day, who almost disapproved of her constant cheerfulness, and yet envied it,—"Ah, Nancy, it is all well enough to be happy now; but I should think the thoughts of your future would sober you. Only suppose, for instance, you should have a spell of sickness, and be unable to work; or suppose your present employers should move away, and no one else should give you anything to do; or suppose—" "Stop!" cried Nancy, "I never supposes. De Lord is my Shepherd, and I knows I shall not want. And, honey," she added to her gloomy friend, "it's all dem supposes as is makin' you so mis'able. You'd better give dem all up, and just trust de Lord."

There is one text that will take all the "supposes" out of the believer's life, if only it is received and acted on in childlike faith: it is Heb. xiii. 5, 6—"Be content, therefore, with such things as ye have; for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, the Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me." What if dangers of all sorts shall threaten you from every side, and the malice, or foolishness, or ignorance of men shall combine to do you harm? You may face every possible contingency with these triumphant words, "The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me." If the Lord is your helper, how can you fear what man shall do unto you? There is no man in this world, nor company of men, that can touch you, unless your God in whom you trust shall please to let them. "He will not suffer thy foot to be moved: he that keepeth thee will not slumber....The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil: he shall preserve thy soul. The Lord shall preserve thy going out, and thy coming in, from this time forth, and even for evermore."

Nothing else but this seeing God in everything will make us loving and patient with those who annoy and trouble us. They will be to us then only the instruments for accomplishing his tender and wise purposes towards us, and we shall even find ourselves at last inwardly thanking them for the blessings they bring us.

Nothing else will completely put an end to all murmuring or rebelling thoughts. Christians often feel a liberty to murmur against man, when they would not dare to murmur against God. But this way of receiving things would make it impossible ever to murmur. If our Father permits a trial to come, it must be because that trial is the sweetest and best thing that could happen to us, and we must accept it with thanks from his dear hand. The trial itself may be hard to flesh and blood, and I do not mean that we can like or enjoy the suffering of it. But we can and must love the will of God in the trial, for his will is always sweet whether it be in joy or in sorrow.

In short, this way of seeing our Father in everything makes life one long thanksgiving, and gives a rest of heart, and, more than that, a gaiety of spirit that is unspeakable. Some one says, "God's will on earth is always joy, always tranquility." And since he must have his own way concerning his children, into what wonderful green pastures of inward rest, and beside what blessed still waters of inward refreshment is the soul led that learns this secret!

If the will of God is our will, and if he always has his way then we always have our way also, and we reign in a perpetual kingdom. He who rides with the Lord cannot fail to win in every encounter; and whether the result shall be joy or sorrow, failure or success, death or life, we may, under all circumstances, join in the Apostle's shout of victory, "Thanks be unto God which always causeth us to triumph in Christ!"

THE COMING AGE,

Nature and Proximity.

—BY J. P. WELTMER.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, (the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar towns, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

Communications.

Dear Restitution:

Having returned home from my tour in the North, among the congregations of brethren in the cities and other places; I desire to mention, out of many pleasant and profitable seasons and interviews, and causes of rejoicing which I had, two or three of special interest. First: I rejoice to have it to say, that though the Divine providence and blessing of our heavenly Father, my youngest daughter, wife of a merchant in Otsego Co. N. Y., whom I visited, has heartily and thankfully received the truth—"the gospel of Christ, which is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth"—as a result of my visit: and that her husband also is greatly interested, and will, I think, soon accept it in its entirety, and render a loving obedience, by baptism into the all-saving Name; thus becoming a member of the "one body"—the "Household of God." They had my books, and I had tried before to talk with them; but had never succeeded in getting them interested. Being worthy acceptable members of the old Christian Denomination, so-called, they felt themselves secure like thousands of others, although never having understood and believed the only gospel, preached by Christ and the apostles. Mark. i. 14, 15; Luke i. 32, 33; viii. 1; ix. 1-9. Acts i. 3; viii. 12; xix. 7-10; xxviii. 22-31. Gal. i. 6-9. 1 Cor. xv. 1-4. Luke xxiv. 27, 44-47. They did not seem to know that it is necessary to believe the gospel, and then obey it, in order to be saved. They did not seem to realize the importance of the Master's own words; he that believeth not the gospel shall be condemned. They did not realize the importance of the "one faith" first, and afterward the obedience—that it is not possible to obey the gospel, by baptism and a holy life, before they have believed it. They did not realize the importance of Christ's coming back to "restore again the kingdom to Israel"—"to build again the tabernacle of David"—"to reign on the throne of his father David, over the house of Jacob (the twelve Tribes of Israel) forever, and of his kingdom no end." They had not realized the importance of the prayer which our Lord taught his followers, to brethren and sisters," Mark iii. 35,—"thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." They were looking to go to heaven when they die—a false hope which God has never promised. Well, I got the privilege of escaping the Christian meeting house, two Sundays, and of talking the glad tidings of the coming reign and the hope of eternal life for all obedient believers, who having this "one hope" have "purified themselves" even as he is pure;" which resulted, through the blessing of God, as aforesaid. Praised be his holy name. Others were also interested. May the good seed continue to take root, and ultimately produce fruit. After I left and was visiting the congregation in Rochester, N. Y., where my brother Dr. J. H. Thomas resides, I received a long letter from my daughter containing many such words as the following. "My dear father, the Bible is a new book to me. It seems so much more clear. I never before took any interest in the study of the Scriptures. Now, the Bible, and these books explanatory of it, are all I care to read; I am so anxious to learn more of the plan of salvation, to feel sure that I am all right. It fills my mind. Astonishing, is it not? Such a change! Oh, I am so thankful. Dear father, you know the spirit in which I say this is not of self praise, but of thankfulness, that my mind is thus changed; and of earnest prayer that I may continue to "hunger and thirst after righteousness," and also because I know dear father, that you will rejoice with me, because all this was under God, through your interest in me. I read my Bible every night on retiring. You cannot imagine how different I feel in regard to that book than what I did before you came here. In teaching me how to understand it you taught me to love it. Thank God!"

I have copied this much, because I think it may be of benefit to others; and because I know that all the true brethren and sisters of Christ, Mark iii. 35, who see and read it, will "rejoice with them that do rejoice." Rom. xii. 19.

While in the city of Toronto, I had the pleasure of seeing and making the acquaintance of Prof. J. P. Weathee of Ohio. Dr. Sparrow, with whom he was stopping, gave us an introduction at the meeting in the Hall Sunday morning. After the meeting, Bro. De Guerre with whom I was stopping, invited him to his house to take dinner with us. I also had the pleasure of hearing an able lecture from him in the evening. He is an eloquent speaker. I was much pleased with him. I regard him as a noble self-sacrificing learned man. One who has devoted his life, abilities and means, to the patient investigation of the purposes of God as revealed in the Scriptures. So far as I have been able to examine his two masterly Works, "The Eastern Question," and "The Coming Age," I find them well calculated to inspire the reader with interest in every subject discussed. Taking both volumes as one mammoth work, it is for many reasons and in many respects, more than masterly, it is marvelous! The field of investigation is the entire world, past, present, and future. I am astonished at every step, and profoundly impressed with the magnitude of the work, the scholarly ability of its author, and the immense amount of study, research and thought which must have been expended in getting it up. Of course I could not endorse everything I find in the work. But it matters not what the reader believes, or how much he knows; in this work he can learn more. It is not possible for any person to read either of these volumes, without being interested and benefitted. It has been well and truly said, that whoever reads these volumes, will lay them aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty, his wonderful and glorious purposes, and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

The work contains a brief but able defense of the genuineness of the genealogy, betrothal, birth and paternity of Jesus, as recorded by Matthew and Luke; that he was not the begotten Son of Joseph, but the only begotten Son of God: thus corroborating the positions taken in my work on the Paternity, etc., of Jesus, which is soon, I trust, to be forth-coming in pamphlet form. (All who desire to have a copy or more, can order at once and pay after receiving it. Price 25 cents in postage stamps, or five for $1.00.) Many have been spoken for at a number of places on my route.

The entire trip, and in every place without exception, not mentioning any one in particular, was one full of repast Christian love and fellowship, on the part of the brethren and congregations or ecclesias, and of mutual enjoyment, heartfelt thankfulness, and we trust, under God, of spiritual development and benefit. But before closing permit me to express my impressions, which have been greatly strengthened during my long tour. It is my impression that this is emphatically the "sleeping and slumbering time of the virgins." Half, at least, will after all their faith in the word, their light and their waiting, be found to be destitute and "foolish" ones. It also seems evident that we are just entering upon a new and wonderful era. The greatest deceptions that ever cursed our world, seem to be insidiously working their way. Their dawn is quite visible in the moral horizon. The air or moral atmosphere seems ripe with a terrible pestilence or epidemic, a moral leprosy, consisting of a mammoth medley made up of all forms of atheism, skepticism, infidelity, and godless systems—Spiritualism, "Theosophy;" or Wisdom Religion; "Christian science;" so-called; "Esoteric Buddhism;" "Hindooism;" or Brahminism; "Occultism;" "Rationalism;" "Humanitarianism;" "Josephism;" "Darwinism;" Faith-cureism; Universalism; Agnosticism, etc. etc. etc.; including all other forms and systems of error. All are developing. Their development is rapid. Some of the leaders tell us, we have just entered upon another great cycle and that very important changes are soon to occur. That a union of all these systems is to culminate in a "Universal Brotherhood—The true religion of humanity." Say they, "Such a reconciliation of religion, philosophy and science, a platform on which all can stand, without the sacrifice of intelligence or self-respect, seems too good to be true." Jesus said, "if it were possible, they shall deceive" the very elect. Behold I have told you before. Let all his brethren and sisters, therefore, beware. Taking in connection, the Freethinkers, the anarchists, the revolutionists, the dynamiters, etc. etc.: and then again, "the great upheavals in the political world, the rapid change in every direction, the progression in art and science, the wonderful and multiform modern inventions, the new discoveries constantly being added, etc. etc. Who cannot see, except they shut their eyes, what these things betoken; that this world is in a transition state; that we must be living in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history?

L. C. Thomas.

Is Elijah the Prophet yet to Come?

"Behold, I send you Elijah the prophet before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." Mal. iv. 5.

Near four hundred years before the birth of Jesus, God spoke these words, through the prophet Malachi; adding also the mission of Elijah, which is, "And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to (with Marg. R. V.) the children, and the heart of the children to (with) their fathers; lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." verse 6.

But if we turn to the first chapter of Luke, we find the angel Gabriel, appearing to Zacharias, and making a promise to him, that his wife Elizabeth shall have a son, and shall "call his name John." The angel also said, "For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord.... And many of the children of Israel shall he turn unto the Lord their God. And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elijah, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to walk in the wisdom of the just; to make ready for the Lord a people prepared for him." In Matthew eleventh chapter we read, in the language of Jesus, "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John, and if ye will receive it (him Marg. R. V.) this is Elijah, which is to come."

And in the seventeenth chapter, after the disciples had seen Moses and Elijah (in vision) on the mount, when Jesus was transfigured before them, they asked Jesus, "Why then say the Scribes that Elijah must first come? And he answered and said, Elijah indeed cometh, and shall restore all things, but I say unto you: that Elijah is come already, and they knew it not, but did unto him whatsoever they listed."

So was not John the Baptist Elijah conditionally, and as he was rejected, shall we not look for Elijah yet to come?

As John was the forerunner of Jesus the Christ in the first advent, will not Elijah be his harbinger in the second advent?

It occurs to me that the prophecy was not fulfilled by John, but must be fulfilled before the great and terrible day of the Lord come.

The promise of the coming of Elijah is, to prepare the way of the Lord when he shall come to exalt the saints, and to destroy the wicked. For they shall be ashes under the soles of the feet of the righteous, see Mal. iv. 3. "Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not." Chap. iii. 18.

[If there should be some future fulfilment of the prophecy concerning Elijah it is our own conclusion that it will be in some way connected with Israel's restoration, and will have no connection whatever with Gentile salvation.—Ed.]

The Sources of the Jordan.

On the very peak of Mt. Hermon may be seen the ruins of a Phœnician temple to Baal, its bevelled stones attesting great antiquity. It was located so that the first rays of the Eastern sun could be seen streaming over the boundless plains of the Syrian desert, and the priests hail with joyful hymns the reappearance of the great Fire God, and at sunset observe and lament the disappearance of their glorious divinity beneath the western horizon.

Adjacent to the temple ruins, we are told by Prof. Porter, may still be seen an excavation in the living rock, where at sunset the great fire in honor of Baal was kindled, and liberally fed with fuel by his devotees during the night. The bright flames shedding their baleful light over so large a part of Syria and the Holy Land, a beacon ten thousand feet high, calling mankind to the worship of Baal, and how well surmise that the Mt. Hermon priests carefully guarded this part of their temple courts from profane view, and spread far and wide the legend that the Fire God nightly kindled his own fires, and that the light so widely seen was a constant miracle attesting the power and divinity of their beloved Baal, and that in allusion to this the prophet of Israel gave the fire challenge to his idolatrous brethren, which they so promptly accepted, believing that the miracle on Mt. Hermon would be repeated on Mt. Carmel.

The Mt. Hermon temple was a central shrine of Baal worship, and probably the most venerated one. On the eastern slopes of the mountain and not far below the temple ruins, breaks out a small fountain, fed by melting snows around the temple area, which is the head of a rivulet, gradually increasing in size and becoming one of the sources of the Jordan, thus connecting the sacred river in its very origin with the worship of Baal.

Let us see if there are no other superstitions connected therewith. At the southern base of Mt. Hermon a great limestone cliff rears its majestic front, interesting enough to a Christian, because doubtless Christ was standing in full view, if not in its grateful shadow, when he said to Peter "On this rock I will build my church," and that remarkable conversation occurred, the perverted interpretation of which is the corner-stone of the great Romish heresy. From a cave in this great cliff issues the fountain of Banias, which, with the adjacent springs, constitutes the main sources of the Jordan. The name "Banias" is a corruption of Paneas (belonging to Pan). The ruins of the ancient city of Paneium, and also those of Cæsarea Philippi are near by.

Here was the chief and the great temple to Pan, the central shrine of his worship, a cave-temple enclosing the fountain, somewhat after the manner of the Hindu cave shrines, which claim the greatest antiquity. The curious traveller may find still the ruins of the temple, trace the carriage in the grotto, and see the niches cut in its sides for the statues of Pan and other deities.

Marvellous indeed that the main source of the Jordan should be thus intimately connected with Grecian and Roman idolatry in its very origin.

To the west or southwest of Banias rises the Hill of Dan, and beneath this, the Fountain of Dan. The Hill of Dan was, as we well know, for many ages the chief locality for the worship of the Golden Calf by the Israelites and others, and a grand temple crowned its summit, whilst a source of the Jordan streamed from beneath its precincts. How strange it is that a river held sacred by Christian, Jew, and Moslem, should have its rise amid scenes of such varied superstitions! No other river can show so many at its sources. No other spot on earth has such varied religious associations.

What caused this remarkable aggregation of cults? Did the dim traditions of the past speak of Jordan's holy nature? Were its waters held to be sacred from the very dawn of the human race? Did some ancient seer behold in prophetic vision the Son of God standing in its course with the water of baptism, consecrating him to the work of redemption, and proclaim that the Redeemer of mankind would thus in ages to come sanctify the waters of the venerable stream?—By A. G. Grinnan, in N. Y. Observer.

JERUSALEM.

[From an exchange we take the following. Our readers all feel an interest in the "City of the Great King," and, especially what is transpiring in Palestine now when the "times of the Gentiles" are so near their close. Israel's long period of dispersion is nearly past, and the day of final restoration is at hand.]

Mrs. Davis writes from Jerusalem under date of August 3d, to the editor of the Herald and Pioneer, Cambridgeport as below:

"The tower on Mt. Olives is to have an electric light placed at the top, which will be seen at Jaffa, so they say; and they are still building higher, so high that Jaffa can be seen from the tower.

I assure you there is much building around Jerusalem. I hardly know how much. We had a slight shock of earthquake last week, the people were a little frightened of course. May the Lord help us in our weakness. We can't do much now. There is not much power on earth but money, and the devil have got that, so we must needs wait.

August 15. The railroad scheme from Jaffa to Jerusalem is growing in favor with the people, and we hope and expect that in time it will bear fruit. Everywhere we see fine buildings going up like magic.

Aug. 27. Our hot weather is now over and the wonderful refreshing night dews have commenced. This morning we went with some friends to the Vineyard where we saw the sun rise in all its majestic splendor over Jerusalem, the Holy City. I could not help thinking as we sat on the wall, how many times Christ and his disciples had watched this glorious sun from the same point; the same sun that now shines upon us. After this scene we built a fire, made tea and enjoyed a quiet breakfast in the shade. Of course we talked of our friends in America, hoping that soon they may join us in our social gatherings.

The body of a wealthy American was brought to Jerusalem this week for interment, at a cost of five thousand dollars. This man died very suddenly. He was the owner of several valuable lots of land in this city which cannot be bought. This man must have had great love for Jerusalem.

Sept. 1st. Mrs. Dargin has been very ill with Syrian fever, but is now, thank God, quite well again. The fruits of this country are so delicious and tempting that we eat a great deal too much and it brings fever, but these fevers are in reality friendly, and when we recover we feel stronger than before. One must learn to live in this country, probably one half of what we eat would be sufficient to sustain life, and the effort of nature to get rid of the surplus causes these fevers. We hear that the coming season is to be a busy one as more than a usual number of tourists are booked for Palestine.

The missionaries in Palestine are getting jealous of each other to the extent that they say very naughty things of each other, it may be a war of words but it looks rather serious. We fail to see the reason of their trouble as all preach the same absurd old Gentile doctrines. No one cares for any truth of course—they are wise enough to see that truth with her bright shining robes and open face would ruin them all financially, and this is a fact. But I am convinced that the Jew is today in a condition to listen to the truth—at least I have found it so. The Jews are far more enlightened in matters of science than the Christians, and are in a better condition to receive the truth. There is much to be said on this subject in future.

Sept. 13th. The Herald came to hand last Saturday and I was much pleased too with its contents.

I am glad to see the firm stand which you have taken for the right regardless of a few dollars. I feel sure that Christ will help the noble defense in his behalf. We know sure that he has a care for this world which his Father has given him, and of his interests much more than people are aware of. Men may and do deceive each other; but him they cannot deceive, thank God! I have never to my knowledge tried to defend the truth or what I understood to be the truth when I was assailed, that I have not had cause to be thankful afterward. To defend the truth is to honor God, for he is truth."

PALESTINE AWAKENING.

The world-wave of progress has not failed to make its mark in Syria, in spite of the grinding and corrupt rule of the Turk. Turkey does nothing to promote the products, trade and prosperity of her subject provinces, but grinds them down with burdensome and merciless taxation, much of which is pocketed by corrupt officials. In spite of all this, and in spite also of the fact that on all the coast of Syria there is not one harbor, and only two roads (one of which, a fine macadam road from Beyrout to Damascus, was made twenty years ago by the French) the people of Syria appear to be progressing rapidly. Beyrout, though without a harbor, has changed, during the last twenty-five years, from a squalid and filthy town of 20,000 people, to a handsome city of 80,000 with well-lighted, well-paved and well-cleaned streets, public water introduced, a public carriage service, and streets of elegant modern houses, as well as a $100,000 paper-mill, which supplies the best qualities of paper for all Syria.

The shipping has in the same twenty-five years grown from 100 vessels, aggregating 30,000 tons, to 400 steamers and 3,500 sailing vessels, with a gross tonnage of 460,000. Trade has so increased that the custom house has been enlarged. The only unchanged thing is the polite Turk in charge, as ready as ever to take his bribe.

At Jaffa, the (harborless) port of Jerusalem, still greater improvements are reported. The old wall has been torn down, the moat filled up, and streets filled with new buildings are rising where these relics of feudal and barbarous times once were. The country round about Jaffa is even more changed than the port itself. It is being converted into an earthly paradise, one vast orange grove, a region of orchards and fruit gardens. The number of such holdings has increased fourfold in the past quarter of a century, and it is estimated that there are now in the immediate vicinity of the port, four hundred of these orange gardens, ranging in size from two to fifteen acres; and finer oranges than those of Jaffa are not grown in the world.

The orange production of Jaffa is said to amount now to eight or ten millions. Land around Jaffa is worth more than it was in Jonah's day. It has risen fifteen-fold. Haifa shows a similar change. The interior towns, too, are showing marked improvement. Jerusalem has cleaner streets, better houses, more toleration for Christians—and is growing faster outside her walls. Her outside population already equals that of her urban inhabitants. Bethlehem, too, is waking up to modern improvements, and so is Tiberias; while filthy Nazareth is showing some sense of awakening.

Gas lights and horse cars will soon change the old, filthy condition of the ancient towns of the Christian story, now haunted by robber Arabs, and Turks that are not less robbers for being more polite. Nablous, the ancient Shechem where Joseph was sold, "is become one vast soap-boiling establishment." It is good to learn also that "its product is in general de-

Olive trees are planted between Nazareth, Safet, and Maplous, at the alleged rate 500,000 annually; and the product of olive oil in the district is said to be upwards of fifteen million pounds' weight! ### THE CHARTER OAK.

It was an old tree on the Wyllys estate at the settlement of Hartford in 1636, and was spared from being cut down at the particular request of the Indians. In 1687, when Sir Edmond Andros attempted to seize the Charter granted in 1662 by King Charles the 2d, to the Connecticut Colony, it was secreted by Capt. Jeremiah Wadsworth in a hollow of the Oak; and there remained till May 9, 1688, when it was resumed as the Charter of the Colony. The tree was blown down about ten minutes before one o'clock in the stormy morning of Aug. 21, 1856.

Immortal Tree! Relic of ages past!
Monarch of other Long centuries have come
And slowly gone, till thou art left the last
Of all thy race; but vigorous still, like some Young forest tree! Thou hast endured the blast,
And met the storm unhurt. The stirring drum
Has beat beneath thy boughs, and the war song
Of the rude savage sounded loud and long.

Tell us, O Tree, how long thou hadst stood
When first our fathers saw thee!—then an acorn
And hollow Oak! If thou will be so good,
Reveal the silent past! Thy life unfold!
What wonderous scenes those mighties relate, that would
Be strange and new! Hast thou seen war-riors bold
Meeting in savage warfare, long before
The pale face landed on this western shore?

Have council fires blazed beneath thee? Canst thou tell
When first the dear one startled from his cell?
Or whether savages did always dwell
Upon Columbia's soil?—If not, from where
They came, and why they scattered? Thou couldst tell
The page of history, and we should stare
At thy disclosures, if thou wouldst disclose
What has transpired since first thy sun arose.

Posterity will reverence thy name
Above all other trees! and they will tell
Their sons, when thou art gone, about thy fame!
That here once stood the tree that guarded well
The Charter of our Liberties, when came
The oppressor, tyrant foe, to pound the knell
Of our young freedom. Still, may thy form stand
For ages yet, the glory of our land.

Other trees have had a short lived fame;—thy Proud name is destined to endure until
The memory of present times shall lie
Buried in oblivion! Time may kill
Thy beauty; but thy name shall never die.
Then stand, O Oak! and grow and flourish still,
Our country's pride, our city's choicest tree—
The badge, the emblem of our Liberty.

Our thanks are due to the Hon. Isaac W. Stuart, the owner of the Charter Oak Estate, for compliance with our solicitation for a piece of the tree, and to the publisher of the Courant for a like favor.

The Courant says, the interest felt, all over our country, in the old Charter Oak of Connecticut, is evinced in the fact that the same morning the tree fell, there were applications to Mr. Stuart, from residents of Texas, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, (the President of Jefferson College in that State,) Minnesota, (for the Historical Society in that Territory,) for fragments of the tree to be preserved as sacred relics. One man applied for a piece for a cabinet of Natural History in San Francisco, and also for a cane for Rev. Horace Bushnell of that State. Both his requests were complied with. It was estimated that a cord and a half of wood was carried off the morning the tree fell. Mr. Stuart, however, provided watchmen to see that undue liberties were not taken; and he had a guard about the tree all night long. Old men bowed with age, begged a sprig in commemoration. They had heard the story of the tree in their childhood, and were saddened at its fall in their old age. Mr. Stuart has contributed a piece of the tree to the N. E. Genealogic Historical Society, located in this city.—From an old Paper.

Secular journalism has seldom had a theme to discuss of so absorbing concern as the one presented in the case of the seven doomed anarchists at Chicago. As was generally expected, the Supreme Court of the United States denied granting the writ of error for which the counsel employed in behalf of the criminals applied. Since this refusal became known, all kinds of appeals have been made to Governor Oglesby for a commutation of the death sentence. The sickly sentimental class, reinforced by a larger class of timid cowards, have been signing petitions to induce the Governor to interfere in arresting capital punishment. Missiles of a threatening character have been sent by the murderous sympathizers outside to the Chief Executive to frighten him into compliance with their demands. What the Governor's final decision may be is not at all obvious to surmise or speculation. The finding of four dynamite bombs in Lingg's cell on Sunday morning has caused great excitement in Chicago. This fact is, of itself, sufficient to show that a new conspiracy had been formed for a greater destruction of life than what occurred at the Haymarket scene on May 4, 1886, when seven men were killed, fifty-eight wounded, making thirteen children fatherless, and five wives husbandless. The Christian can only leave all these matters to the "powers that be." We know that wicked men will wax worse and worse till this age shall end. It is possible that the Governor may commute the death sentence in the case of one or two, but no way certain that he will. It is said that about 5,000 picked regular soldiers of the U. S. Service are coming to Chicago armed with repeating rifles, and revolvers, and furnished with an extra amount of cartridges, and that the State troops are to hold themselves in readiness for any emergency. Whether the unparalleled crime shall meet the doom, as sentenced by the courts, will soon be decided. The civilized world awaits the outcome with anxiety.

MACEDONIA.

About 1835 years ago, or A. D. 52, the Apostle Paul was directed from heaven to proclaim the gospel in Europe. In a night vision a form appeared to come and stand by him; and he recognized in the supernatural visitant "a man of Macedonia who prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us." Acts xvi. 9. From an exchange, The World's Crisis, we reprint the article below taken from the Judgment Message. Our readers will learn with pleasure that God still remembers Macedonia. On the nature and personality of God we have always felt to speak with reserved awe. "God is a Spirit;" and we read with profound veneration all Scripture allusions to his most wonderful being. Finite conceptions are far too limited and feeble to grasp the Infinite and Eternal. While we should speak with more reserve on the Divine Personality we place the entire article before our readers.

THE WORK OF GOD IN MACEDONIA.

The following brief history and experience of Bro. Basil Stephanoff of Macedonia, European Turkey, we solicited from him for our personal gratification; but believing it would serve to awaken a deeper missionary spirit to spread abroad the light that has illuminated the soul of Bro. Stephanoff, we publish it and send it abroad, praying that it may be followed with the divine blessing.—Judgment Message.

Beloved Brother in Christ:

With Christian salutation and greeting I come to testify of the goodness of God toward me in his far off land of Macedonia, from whence it comes to you the same and still greater cry, "Come over into Macedonia, and help us."

I was born May 3rd, 1860, in Constantinople. My father died when I was in the second year of my life in this evil world, and after his death we returned to our native land—Macedonia, in the city Monastir—my mother and brother and myself.

My parents and myself have been members of the Greek Church, which is almost like the Roman Catholic, and perhaps in some respects worse. We worshiped images, and prayed to the Virgin Mary, and to all saints for forgiveness and salvation, and sometimes we had to pay the priest a few dollars to get forgiveness or peace; that was the way we have been kept in darkness and in the bondage of the beast of Rome. My mother and brother are still members of the same sect; but they know a good deal that their church is not in harmony with, of the precious word of God, who loved us and gave his only begotten Son of God for us to die upon the cross.

In my younger years I was sent to school till my eighth year, and then I was compelled to learn a business that I may take care of my mother and myself; also in the same time I was studying a good deal. I had great desire and love toward spiritual books—i. e., church books on religion. The Lord supplied me in the fifteenth year of my life with the Book of books, which is the Holy Bible that tells about God and us; and oh! how I liked to read in it, and while reading I found that the Greek Church in which I belonged was entirely opposed to the Bible. Our Church Catechism taught me that the Bible is the book on which is found the religion of Christ. The Bible was to me sweeter than honey, and dearer than any book in the world. I found wonderful things in it that helped me to know better the way of God that leads to life. While studying this book I found once these words: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything.....Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them nor serve them: for I am the Lord and beside me there is none else." And I read many other texts like the above that worshiping images and serving them I found it was a sin, and displeasing before God, and a heathenish mode of worship, and so I gave them up and never turned since then.

But this was not all; this was the first thing; and then I asked in myself why we pray so much to Mary and to the saints and very little to God. I began to study this in myself, and from common sense I thought it was wrong. In my Bible I found passages that are opposed praying to Mary, etc., etc. "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" beside Christ, the Son of God. "I, even I, am the Lord, and beside me there is no Savior." Still further I read about Jesus that, "Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Savior;" "I am the way, the truth, and the life." These passages and many others made me believe that Mary and all the other saints cannot save us, nor can save themselves without Jesus, who came to save the lost. But the Greek Church taught me that they intercede before us. Praise the Lord that his book tells us all about interceding: "For there is one God and one Mediator [not many] between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." "It is Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." "Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him [not by Mary or the saints], seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." "And if any man sin we have an [not many] advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." The above and a great many other texts convinces me that it was vain to trust the saints to intercede for me, for they "know not anything;" and that they are not in heaven at present, neither can be, but they are sleeping in the grave, and will till Christ comes the second time on earth to establish the Kingdom. And so I was led to know that Christ is the only Mediator or Advocate who interceedes for me and none else; this is a blessed knowledge to know that forgiveness by him only can be received and without money; as we did while giving money to the priest for forgiveness and salvation to be obtained.

Now I lost faith in the Greek Church and in all their teachings, as praying for the dead, and giving alms for their salvation, etc., and so I was converted toward the Protestant Church, and for many years I was in darkness, and with doubts for many things, and could not find any rest or peace or any difference.

First I thought that the Protestant faith must be the same faith of the Son of God, but after studying my Bible, and then in the theological school, I fail to find it so. Their views about God is entirely outside of the Bible, and really while with them I did not know what I worshiped; for they believed that God is an immaterial thing, not a person with organism of shape and parts, merely spirit, wind, air, and breath. I began to study nature and the Bible, for these are the two books that we have; the one is older than the other; nature tells me that there is a God; the Bible tells me about him and his attributes, nature, etc.

While Protestant theology teaches that "God is an immaterial thing," I was wondering with the words of Matt. v. 8, "The pure in heart shall see God," and how can I see God if he has no personal form or shape? I read, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." "For in the image of God made he man." This plainly speaks that God has an image or likeness, form or shape; but what with Protestant mythical doctrine? We turn now also to read in Heb. i. 3, and we find that Christ is "the express image of his [God's] person," and in Rev. xxii. 4 we read, "And they shall see his face;" and I thought it a strange thing. How can I see his face if he has no face? and how can I pray to him "Our Father," when he is not a person, but an immaterial thing—and how can such a thing hear or see? Now I came to the knowledge of the true God, and worshiped a real, personal, great and good Being, whose face I expect by and by to see. I began not to worship an immaterial or a nonentity God,—I didn't recognize such a God as the Protestant taught me. I neither believed that Christ or the prophets, or the apostles, did recognize such a mythical and abominable error that Satan has established about God.

The more I studied of God, the more I began to know my sinful state or condition. Now I began to doubt that I had been a Christian, for I never knew God. I was worshiping (so to say) nothing, and my worship was heathenish, nothing else. Great hunger and thirst came to me after God. I began to pray that he might have mercy on unworthy me, and to forgive me, and to wash me by the precious blood of his Son from all sin. One day I made up my mind not to go anywhere till I found God, and had peace with him. I opened my Bible and read the 51st Psalm, and began to weep before God as never before; but weeping does not save, nor knowledge. Oh, how wretched I was! Did not know what to do. Some have told me before "only believe, and it is done." I believed in God, in a personal God, and in Jesus Christ; but still I was a sinner, not forgiven—just as I was before. Oh, poor me! What must I do to be saved was the thinking part in me, and it came to me the words of Jesus, "Come unto me all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest;" but this could not do me any good, for I came to Jesus only with my body, and did not carry my heart to him to cleanse it; still I felt miserable; wept and cried out before God: O God, save me, and give me peace, or I rather die. It seemed to me life was not worth living while without God, without Christ, and without hope.

I read the 55th chapter of Isaiah, and found the words: "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found: call ye upon him while he may be near." These words encouraged me still to seek him, and to call upon him while he is near. I did so, but still I was miserable. At last I began to think in myself what is the matter? Why can I not find God, and have peace with him, and how others become Christians so quick, and I am still not a child of God. While my Bible was opened I read again, Isa. lv. 6, 7, and began to read the seventh verse, but could go no further; began to think on the words: "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

This text took me a good deal of time to understand that it meant me, and when I came to Isaiah lv. 8, I began to read it differently to see if it was right. I read now, "Let the wicked [Basil] forsake his way, and the righteous [Basil] his thoughts, and let [Basil] return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon [Basil], and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon [Basil]." This text broke me down; it cut me like a two-edged sword; this showed me what was the matter that I did not do, and what kept me away from God; this told me that self was the biggest burden that bore on me; and this self made me miserable; this text at last showed me how to come to God through Jesus.

I know began to pray; knelt down weeping before God; forsook my evil ways and evil thoughts; repented from all sin that I knew, and I returned to the Lord, gave myself to him, and cried out as never before, and the more hungry and thirsty after God I was until I found him; it went so for several hours; that day I gave up my will and did not care for anything else but God. Now while I was on my knees I made a complete surrender to him; and said, O God, take my life, my moments, my hands, my feet, my lips, my voice, my youth, my intellect, my will, my heart, myself, my all, to be thine forever, and keep me and lead me by thy hand, and help me to do always thy will, and give me power to fight the battle until the end for Jesus' sake. Amen!

Now my prayer was received, and oh what a blessing fell on me. It seemed to me I was immersed in something. I could not rise from my knees: tears after tears were shed for joy. O, what peace! Now I was reconciled to God, and had peace with God, and peace in my heart. Now I knew that I am the child of God; now the Spirit beareth witness with my own spirit that I am his child; now my sins were taken away once forever; now sadness and sorrow was taken from me, and instead of it singing, "Happy day! happy day!" Now my heart became filled toward a personal God, glorious Father, who loved me, and gave his only Son to die for me a sinner, that I might be saved. I at once began to testify what God had done for me and in me, and from darkness into the light brought me by his mercy toward unworthy me. Praise the Lord, O my soul!

Now the world and Satan got terribly after me to get me out of the Book of Ages; and while they could not, began to persecute me and trouble me, the battle was becoming great and greater and now still greater, but the throne of grace became nearer and the grace of God sufficient for weak me; God with me and in me by his Spirit, and around me and so the devil and his ministers could not do me any harm. Calvary was the place where I found power at the feet of Jesus, at the cross; here I sat down at the feet of Jesus, and was willing to learn of him. At the cross Satan could not come, for the cross blinds him and so he could not do me any harm. And until now the Lord has protected and kept me, and he will until Jesus comes to save me completely from this evil world.

While I give myself to God, and to follow the footsteps of Jesus, and to preach the gospel, Satan tried to make me a popular preacher of his own through money offering; and the more he tried, the more grace was given to sustain and help me to preach the word by his power, and to wait on him for all I need. Now he opened before me wonderful truths that I never knew. Now the Spirit of God truly led me into all the truth as far as I understand. Now the theology that I was studying became to me entirely vain, and I gave it up.

While studying about the saints that they go up to heaven and the wicked to hell, I was wondering what need of Christ to come? What need of a resurrection from the grave, if the saints are in heaven? and another for the wicked if they are in hell-fire? And what need of a judgment day, if they were judged at death? And why rewarded at the great day, if rewarded at death as modern theology teaches? And I began to study my Bible, for I loved this book from my fifteenth year ever since, and I find always news that comforts me to go on until he comes. I found in my Bible its teachings or the teachings of the Apostolic Church or Church of Christ, is entirely changed by the beast of Rome, the mother of harlots.

1. On God, as I have spoken before.

2. The nature of man. Theology teaches that man is immortal—this I do not find the Bible proves—to the contrary I find that man is totally mortal, soul and body. My Bulgarian Bible teaches me that God only has immortality. Also that it is promised to us to be given at the great day. Still further it teaches me that man is a seeker of immortality, and if he has it why does he seek? Now the doctrine of the never dying soul leads to many errors, such as that the children of God at death go up to heaven; when my Bible teaches the contrary: "No man hath ascended up into heaven," neither can. This leads to another error, that the dead go into two places when my Bulgarian Bible teaches no contrary; that all righteous and unrighteous go into one place, and that is the grave.

Also it leads to another error that the saints are rewarded at death when the Book of books teaches the opposite, that the reward will be granted at the great day—at the resurrection. It leads to another error which theology teaches that the wicked at death go into hell-fire to be tormented forever, which is against my Bible—but they go into the grave, and will be there until the resurrection to be punished by destruction.

The Bible tells me that Christ soon is coming to establish his everlasting kingdom on earth restored. The world will not be converted before his coming as theology teaches. The Bible tells me that there will be two resurrections. The Bible tells me our own inheritance will be the earth not heaven. The Bible tells me that the city of God the New Jerusalem is coming down or earth restored, to be inherited by the bride of Jesus. How then can I preach the doctrines of the beast of Rome and her daughters the Protestant sect? I rather suffer hunger and die than to lie against my God and his word. The truths that I hold so dear I got from the Bible, and it is confirmed with a "Thus saith the Lord!" not Wesley, or Calvin, or Luther, etc. I praise God for this wonderful truth given to me, and to us he gives still greater light daily. The coming of the Lord has been preached here from 1881, for I remember the first sermon that I preached that he is soon coming to establish his kingdom, and give life eternal to all that wait for him, in Sofia, Bulgaria.

My soul praises God for this hope of his coming, for since I began to preach it God gave me more power for service, and led me to watchfulness, patience, self-denial, righteousness and godliness, purity of heart, to love the saints all over the world, to faithful work and consecration to God; yes, this led me to endure sufferings and reproaches for Christ's sake, and to abide in him till he comes with the glorious city of God. O, blessed hope! O, glorious hope! O, that we might be ready to see the King of Zion, and be with him forever in Paradise! For this I work; for this I pray; for this I suffer; for this I will wait until the new birth comes by and by, and the time is not far distant.

Till then I will go on by his grace and fight the battle of faith, and fear not, for God is my protector, keeper, and all in all. I will hold up the banner of truth and holiness unto the Lord, by his power; for if we suffer with him, and for him, we shall reign with him: "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time, are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us" at the great day of our King Jesus. Yes; till then I will bear the cross cheerfully and thankfully to him that I might become perfect through suffering as my Savior did.

O reader, our sufferings are for a short time—soon they will be removed—but we shall abide with him forever.

O brethren, help us to carry on this work in this far off land of Macedonia! Our greatest cry is: "Come over into Macedonia, and help us." Oh, who of you are ready to say, Here am I, Lord, send me, from the bottom of his or her heart? Oh, don't forget Macedonia; give us a helping hand that we might give the message of his soon coming on earth.

Brother, sister, a cry comes to you,
From an ancient far off land,
'Tis from sighing Macedonia,
Can you send a helping hand
To prepare us
That we may before Christ stand?

May God help you to help us in my prayer. I am greatly in need of help even for our living. Oh, pray that God may provide and that I may work for him until he comes to bring souls into the ark of salvation. Yours in faith and hope forever.—Judgment Message.

The Weight of a Name.

The "weight of a name" generally signifies to the popular mind the influence the name carries by reason of the weight of reputation which attaches to it; and to weigh a hair has been as impossible as to number all the hairs of the head. An exchange describes a little machine which will literally weigh a signature—that is, the amount of black lead rubbed upon the paper to make the name—and accurately weigh a hair.

In a Broadway store, which is a branch of a big out-of-town scale factory, are specimens of every grade of weighing machine. The smallest scales of all are made for delicate tests in assaying. The weights are mere atoms of aluminum, not half as large as the head of a pin. The machine is so delicate that a little dust blowing in from the street might affect its workings, and it has to be carefully cleaned after its exposure. It is made of aluminum, platinum, and the finest tempered steel, and costs as much as its weight in gold. Every once in a while a sceptic comes along who doesn't believe it will weigh a hair from a man's head, and if the manager of the store has plenty of time at his disposal he will bring out the wonderful little machine and operate it. A reporter happened in the other day while the operation was going on. The manager took a slip of ordinary writing paper and weighed it. It weighed thirty-eight milligrammes. He then gave it to the visitor with a lead pencil and the visitor wrote, "John Henry Larned," on it in a full, free hand. Then the manager put the little slip on the scale and fixed the little weights. When he struck a balance again he had forty-three milligrammes on the other side. The signature weighed precisely five milligrammes. Then the man pulled a hair out of his head and the manager found it weighed three milligrammes.—The Voice.

HOW TO BE A "NOBODY."

It is easy to be nobody, and the Watchman tells how to do it. Go to the drinking saloon to spend your leisure time. You need not drink much now, just a little beer or some other drink. In the meantime play dominoes, checkers, or something else to kill the time, so that you will be sure not to read any useful books. If you read anything, let it be the dime novel of the day. Thus go on keeping your stomach full and your head empty, and yourself playing time-killing games, and in a few years you will be a first-class nobody, unless you should turn out a drunkard or a professional gambler, either of which is worse than nobody. There are any number of young men hanging about saloons just ready to graduate and be nobodies.—Scientific American.

Cuplin.—At the home of her parents, near Norfolk, Neb., Sept. 7, 1887, Alice, eldest daughter of John and Matilda Cuplin, aged 19 years, 6 months, and 20 days.

Friend Alice was born Feb. 9, 1868. She was sick only three days, but suffered severely. She had strained her back while working as attendant at the Asylum at Independence, Iowa, but no one imagined her in a dangerous condition until it was too late. All was done that could be done, but to no purpose; death had claimed her as his victim, and in spite of all aid and medical skill, she fell asleep in the quiet sleep of death. What makes it doubly sad, her mother was away from home at the time of her death, not knowing anything of what was transpiring at home till she arrived the next evening after her death. Imagine the grief of that mother who had looked forward to a happy re-union with husband and children, now to step in and see sorrow's trace on every face. She knew at a glance all was not right, and how could they break the news. But the father who had watched so faithfully by the bedside of his dying child was the one to speak, and O, how sad! But such is life, so full of trouble and disappointment. The oldest brother arrived home a short time after the mother's arrival. He was at Lincoln attending school when the sad news reached him. So sudden and unexpected was her death that it was a great shock to him. Her brother John, who is at the Black Hills, did not reach home at all. And the one who is a short time expected to share her joys and her sorrows with her through life, did not get there till the next morning after her burial. It was a sad blow on him and he has the heart-felt sympathy of the entire community. O may the good Lord help all to look forward to the day when sorrow and sighing shall be done away; when the last enemy shall be destroyed, which is death; when all that are in their graves shall come forth. O, mourning ones, look up, for soon the day will dawn when he that is to come will come and not tarry.

Dearest Alice thou hast left us,
Here thy loss we deeply feel!
But 'tis death that has bereft us,
God can all our sorrows heal.

Hartouin.—At his home in Goffs, Nemaha Co., Kan., Sept. 23, 1887, of catarrh of the stomach, Brother Hartough, aged 53 years.

Brother Hartough was born in Blowenburg, Somersett Co., N. J., on Feb 21st, 1834. He leaves a wife, one daughter and two sons to mourn their loss, besides a large circle of friends. He was a devoted husband and father, a kind neighbor and one who won the respect of all who knew him. He was a firm believer in the second coming of Christ; in fact that was his theme. How he loved to talk of the glorious restitution. We have now before us the letter from the dear bereaved companion, telling us the sad news, and requesting us to send the papers to The Restitution. We extend to her and family our deepest sympathy. We realize how one so kind and devoted will be missed. She says he did not give up until the day before he died. He thought all the time he would recover. When he began to realize he could not live, he said, "Dear wife and daughter, I am going to die, I am going to die; I think I shall live again." What a glorious hope this is. Just such a hope as Paul had. In his epistle to Timothy he said, "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord the righteous judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but all them that love his appearing." 2 Tim. iv. 8.

Hear Paul again to the Thessalonians: "But I would not have you ignorant brethren concerning them which are asleep, that you sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first, then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. iv. 13–18.

Dear bereaved friends, are they not comforting words? O may the blessed assurance of a resurrection comfort you like Martha of old, who knew her beloved brother would rise again in the resurrection at the last day. John xi. 24.

The funeral services were conducted by Brother Boge.

The Cedar Grove of Lebanon.

You have often read of the cedars of Lebanon. Some of them still remain. The grove from which King Solomon brought so much lumber now consists of some 400 trees, about three-fourths of a mile in circumference, partly young ones. Learned travellers think that most of the trees in the grove may be 200 years old, and several between the ages of 400 and 800 years. There are twelve trees whose age is incalculable—seven standing very near each other; three more a little further on, and two on the northern edge of the grove. The largest of these two is 63 feet in circumference—following the sinuosities of the bark; one of the others measures 49 feet. These trees are more remarkable for their girth than stature, their height hardly exceeding 50 feet. The age is variously estimated. The rules by which botanists determine the age of trees are not applicable to them, for their stems have ceased to grow in regular concentric rings. The Arabs, of all creeds, have a traditional veneration for these trees.—Philadelphia Times.

"The life of Christianity," said Luther, "consists in possessive pronouns." It is one thing to say, "Christ is a Savior;" it is quite another to say, "He is my Savior and my Lord." The devil can say the first; the true Christian alone can say the second.—J. C. Ryle.

The Waning Year.

The year has passed its middle life,
Its locks are getting thin,
For it has reached the mystic bound
Where somber days begin.

The little birds which sang so sweet,
Are hushed to silence now;
They've left their pretty nests which swing
Upon the yielding bough.

On every tree we see the march
Of the relentless thief,
Which steals the beauty June bestowed,
And leaves the yellow leaf.

October wears a mottled coat,
November sheds a tear,
And winds which sweep the hill and plain,
Will rock the waning year.

Thus year by year, with breathless haste,
Swift time speeds nimbly by;
The ages creep, the centuries walk,
While years take wings and fly.

We look around, and lo! we see
Our kin bowed down with grief;
Springtime and summer are no more—
Life's in the yellow leaf.

We raise our eyes and look aloft
Above the din of strife,
To him who rides his loved ones o'er
To an eternal life.

Then hurl old Time speed on the wing,
Roll round the hastening year,
Till God shall take his ransomed home,
And dry the falling tear.

A Hero of Duty.

In the north of Holland, over an extent of three leagues, the country is not protected from the incursions of the sea by any natural barrier. Some two hundred years ago the Dutch undertook the gigantic task of erecting enormous dykes of granite blocks and clay to resist the force of their terrible invader. Behind this shelter numerous villages arose, which flourish to the present day. Alkmond, in particular, which number 10,000 inhabitants, is built a little below the dyke, which is kept in constant repair by two hundred workmen under the direction of an engineer.

One afternoon in November about a century ago, a furious wind was blowing from the northwest, increasing every moment. The engineer in charge was a young man, engaged to be married, whose friends and family lived in Amsterdam. He was to go to Amsterdam that very evening to join a great festival, long looked forward to and eagerly desired. His preparations were all made and he was in high spirits, ready to set out. Suddenly the sound of the rising wind struck upon his ear, and he remembered with a pang of anxiety that it was the time of the high tides. He thought of his dyke and of all that depended on it. It would be a dreadful disappointment not to go. But the dyke! His friends would be all expecting him. What would they think. But the dyke! There was a fierce conflict between inclination and duty.

It is six o'clock. The sea is rising. But at seven he must set out for Amsterdam. Shall he go? His heart says yes; duty says no. Again he looks at the sea, watches the rising storm, and decides to remain at his post.

He then runs to the dyke. It is a scene of the utmost confusion. His two hundred men are aghast, bewildered. The storm has become a hurricane. The supply of tow and mortar is exhausted! They are at their wits' end to know how to repair the breaches—how to defend the place against the terrible enemy which is every moment gaining upon them. But as soon as the young engineer appears a joyous cry bursts from every breast, "Here is the master! God be praised! Now all will be well."

The master places each workman at his post and a desperate battle begins between man and the furious ocean. About half-past eleven there is a cry from the center—

"Help! help!"

"What is the matter?"

"Four stones carried away at a blow!"

"Where is that?"

"Here to the left."

The master does not lose a moment. He fastens a rope around his body; four workmen do the same; and forty arms seize the ropes, while the five brave fellows throw themselves into the waves to repair the damage. The mad waves struggle with them. No matter; they do their duty, and then are hauled on land again.

But the cry, "Help! help!" soon rises from all parts.

"Stones!" cries one.

"There are no more."

"Mortar!"

"There is no more."

"Take off your clothes!" cries the master, tearing off his own; "stop the holes with them!"

What will men not do for a noble leader in a great cause? Cheerfully, without a murmur, straining every nerve, the gallant two hundred toil on, half-naked, exposed to all the fury of a November tempest.

It wants a quarter to midnight. A few inches more and the sea will have burst over the dyke and spread furiously over the defenceless country. Tomorrow there will not be a living soul in all those flourishing villages. The clothes are all used up; but the danger increases; the tide will rise till midnight.

"Now, my men," said the clear, thrilling voice of the master, "we can do nothing more. On your knees, all of you, and let us each cry mightily to God for help."

"And there, in the midnight darkness, on the dyke, which shook and trembled beneath the fury of the tempest, the brave two hundred knelt, lifting their hands and their hearts to him who can say to the winds and waves, "Peace; be still." And as upon the Sea of Galilee, so now he heard his children cry and delivered them in their distresses.

Meanwhile the people of Alkmond ate and drank, sang and danced, little thinking that there was but a few inches of mason work between them and death! Thousands of lives had been saved because one man had done his duty.—British Messenger.

"Who Is My Mother?"

I need not remind Bible readers about the circumstances that prompted, caused, our Lord to ask the above question. Some I believe are disposed to think our Lord here gave another evidence that he was lacking in filial affection. From our poor, frail, craven standpoints, the question is a little harsh; but when we remember that truth to him was of more importance than family ties or even life itself, the question is just what it ought to be under the circumstances. It is a common thing to hear church people say, "I want to be like my Lord." We can have no grander wish. If we are in earnest when we say this, nothing will be allowed to come between us and the truth as taught by Jesus; not even our mother and brethren standing without sending or calling for us. "And he looked round about on them which sat about him, and said. Behold my mother and my brethren! Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister and my mother." Mark iii. 35. What a precious "whosoever" this is; does it include me? One of the commonest and weakest arguments urged by disputants, especially if their opponents happen to bear hard upon their peculiar notions or dogmas, is that their mothers taught them so and so in infancy. This is usually considered a cloncher which admits of no reply. But is it fair, and does it accord with sound sense? Could not our mothers be mistaken?

My poor mother loved me and used to tell me beautiful witch stories, now must I believe all the fairy tales she told me just because she is my mother? Her opportunities of learning truth were never equal to mine. Don't understand me as depreciating either a mother's precepts or influence where it is proper. There is no truer, safer or holier guide than a good mother. I do protest though against allowing mother's teaching to shut out all investigation in questions pertaining to human nature and human destiny. Jesus says, "Learn of me," not of our mothers, nor of man made creeds. (Put this in your hat.) The Christian religion is perfectly able to stand alone, and those who deprecate investigation are enemies rather than friends of truth. Christ's teachings need no extraneous bolstering. If stripped of every accessory with which controversy and unwise dogmatism have surrounded them, they would still be as true, as thoroughly fitted to every age and condition of society, and as sublime as when first uttered.

Independent thought, which is beginning to flood the world, is not the enemy but the friend of Christianity. This brings me to what came of a little independent thinking by a dear friend here in Baltimore recently. He is a genuine Scotch Presbyterian from Fife. For several years I have been on intimate terms with him, meeting him in the morning, at noon and at night. During the last six months or so I thought I would question him about his "immortal soul." At first he appeared to treat my talks as a good joke. He laughed heartily at my presumption, taking him to be a poor, neglected Scotsie. He no doubt had thoughts akin to the great Naaman when he first met the rough looking man of God, Elisha, and if he did not say it, he at least thought it, are not my teachers in Green Caledonia as good as your teachers in Green Erin? May I not obtain a knowledge of the truth through them?

After failing to laugh me out o' court, he intimated that we might by an exchange of views be helpful to each other. I proposed at once that we write, at our respective homes what the Bible says about mortal souls, avoiding with care all allusion to "immortal souls." I led in the examination of mortal souls, and then I asked him to lead off in an article on "immortal souls." Need I tell you that we have not reached the immortal soul subject yet. While waiting I wrote to Brother I. C. Welcome that I had a bite, the kind of fish, etc. He kindly responded with a copy of the "Unspeakable Gift," by our deceased Brother Pettingell, which I loaned my friend who read it carefully. It was a 50 cent copy. In his office the other day I asked him if he was ready to return it. "Well, look here," said he, "it is somewhat rubbed, and I thought I would like to have it in more substantial binding. Here is $2.00; won't you kindly try and obtain two one dollar copies, one for yourself and one for me. I have been greatly benefitted by reading it, and I thank you for putting it in my hands. It meets a want myself and others have long felt, but were unable to meet. Mr. Pettingell deserves the gratitude and thanks of truth seekers everywhere." Amen. This is the voluntary testimony of my Presbyterian friend to the "Unspeakable Gift." I enclosed his two dollars and one more to pay for the Hymnal sent me some time ago. I think if every church member in our land would read this book in a "who is my mother" spirit, "The Unspeakable Gift" would prove an unspeakable help to the earnest seeker for a better understanding of God's word. Contrive some way of letting good Brother Welcome know the result of his gift, "the Unspeakable Gift."

Dear Restitution:

Just returned home from Missouri, where I held a meeting at two different places; one at Modoc, in the neighborhood of Brother H. Morrison's, where I baptized three precious souls into the all saving name of Jesus the Christ—two from the Campbellite church and one from the Methodist church; got one new subscriber for THE RESTITUTION. From there I went into the neighborhood of our Brother and Sister Finn, where I staid over the fifth Sunday in October. Had a good time with the brethren, a good turnout and all seemed interested. Bid them farewell and left for home, having been gone just fifteen days. The brethren remembered me, knowing that they that preach the gospel must live off the gospel. Yours in hope,

JOHN FOORE.

Words of Brotherly Exhortation and Cheer to the Leaders of the Forlorn Hope.

Possibly I may be regarded by some as a gloomy Pessimist for asking their attention to such a theme as just announced. Allow me therefore to define and illustrate what I mean by the topic selected. The lexical meaning of forlorn is destitute, forsaken, alone, etc. Now it is not in this sense we use the term—but rather in the sense a grateful country attaches to it. The history of our country records the deeds of small bands of noble, brave, valiant men, reckless of danger, fearless of death, who have performed prodigies of valor. Nelson's name will be covered with naval glory, while the Archives of Britain remain. Wellington and Waterloo will never be forgotten. Havelock's relief of Lucknow is a sample of what we mean by leading a forlorn hope,—that frightful siege and the prolonged sufferings of those who held out against the besiegers; Jessie, worn almost to death by long watching, hearing the slogan and crying out, —in hopeful weakness—"Dinna ye hear it, the Campbells are coming." The hard fight and then the deliverance of the starving captives. Now it is in this sense of bravery, self-sacrifice, and noble daring, we wish you to interpret the "Forlorn Hope." I believe it is on record that when the Patriots of Switzerland made their grand struggle for independence they were surrounded by a vast forest of the enemy's spears, when their leader called out, "Will none of you make a way through?" A few brave devoted ones sold their lives dearly, but successfully, and their country was free. That was forlorn hope,—not in the sense of being destitute or forsaken, but it was the courage of desperation, it was the resolve to conquer or to die in the attempt. It was noble and grand of Gordon to ride alone through the sandy desert to try and appease the Soudanese at Khartoum; and though he died in the attempt it was noble on his part to make it.

But we leave the fiery scenes of war and bloodshed to look at other Leaders. Christian Missionaries have sold themselves to be galley slaves that they might preach the Gospel to the condemned ones, to whom they became companions. Hundreds of brave men have risked their lives in the Arctic regions, to find the North-West passage, and reach the North Pole; and numbers have laid down their lives in this forlorn hope. Livingstone and Stanley in exploring Africa, for science and geography have their martyrs, as well as Christianity.

But we are ready to venture the assertion that every effort to bless and benefit mankind by leading them to reconciliation with God may be regarded as a forlorn hope. Satan's grand stratagem fatally succeeded in Eden—and his twofold falsehood—"Ye shall not surely die: for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil"—continues to influence poor sinful humanity. To the first we owe the frightful dogma of the natural immortality of the soul: the second I think was sought to be developed in the dreadful crime that brought the deluge when the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, united with them in marriage, and the offspring of these unions, were the Nephilim or Giants—an entire corruption of human nature. But this atrocious attempt to thwart the plan of God, utterly failed. God found Noah righteous in his generation, and he and his family were spared to perpetuate the human race, —while in righteousness God destroyed the mongrel products of unholy union. Yet mercy lingered for 120 years, during which Noah fed this forlorn hope as a preacher of righteousness.

Moses and Aaron often proved, as leaders of Israel from Egypt to Canaan, that theirs was a forlorn hope. When they came to the Red Sea, and had to stand still and see the Salvation of God that he wrought for them and his people, by dividing the sea for them and destroying the host of Pharaoh. Gideon, in generations afterward, led a forlorn hope with his three hundred men, with their lamps, pitchers and trumpets against the hosts of Midian: the Lord gave them the victory. Elijah, that wonderful Prophet, at the time of Ahab's wickedness and Israel's idolatry, was the leader of a forlorn hope:—Whom, after all the grand displays of Jehovah's power and glory, Jezebel the Queen sought his life, and under the juniper tree he asked the Lord to let him die for he was no more successful than his fathers. Ezra and Nehemiah were leaders of a forlorn hope when they returned with a small band of men to rebuild the Temple and City of Jerusalem. Jonah, of querulous temper—was the leader of a forlorn hope when he went to Nineveh crying, "yet 40 days and Nineveh shall be destroyed."

Passing by numbers of other Scriptural illustrations, let us look at the noblest the universe has ever seen, or known, that of our Incarnate Redeemer. Do you shrink, brethren? and say this is too daring an illustration to make,—the Divine Redeemer—the Conqueror of sin, death, and hades —the leader of a forlorn hope! yet in reverence we venture to show that he was such. 1st. Because he only in all the universe of being could undertake this vast enterprise. He alone could fulfil the conditions, take our nature, bear our sins, lay down his life as God's penalty for sin, and then in resurrection take it again. 2nd. The Scripture facts that are recorded of him prove our position. He was despised and rejected of men; the world esteemed him stricken, smitten of God and afflicted; betrayed by one of his disciples. His own nation's rulers and priests clamored for his life,—crying, "Away with him: crucify him: his blood be on us and our children." Crucified between two thieves, the object of scorn and derision to the rulers, priests and people, he hangs there suffering and dying as if forsaken both of God and man,—for the cry of his dying lips is, "My God! My God! why hast thou forsaken Me?" yet the conflict ends in victory: for with a loud voice of triumph he cries "It is finished" and gives up his spirit to his Father. He has trod the winepress alone, poured out his soul unto death, sinks into the state of the dead, comes under the power and dominion of death, lays in the prison house of death—the grave—until the call of the righteous covenant-keeping Father on the morn of the third day, then in the power of an endless life, and as the Life-giver he rose to die no more; but ever lives to confer everlasting life on all who put their trust in him.

And now, brethren, we, and all true Christians, are the followers—the disciples of this crucified and risen Savior. What is our mission? What was that of his apostles? Listen! "As my Father hath sent Me, even so I send you." How did Christ send them? As all conquering Ambassadors, to whom the world would submit, as soon as they heard their message? Nay—"Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves," Matt. x. 16. Or as Luke x. 3, "Go your ways, behold I send you forth as lambs among wolves." They were to be "wise as serpents, but harmless as doves," and so it is still, it is the meekness and gentleness of Christ; even the power of the Divine Spirit was to strengthen in the passive virtues—endurance, patience, and faith in the unseen Savior. The numerical result of Christ's personal ministry was not great, for after his resurrection and ascension, the number of the names of his disciples were but 120, or at most 500. True, larger numbers soon were gathered, but persecution broke out and they were scattered abroad, and they preached Christ, and the grand message was soon widely spread. But it was a proscribed mission, strictly forbidden, both by Jew and Pagan. Proscription, banishment, martyrdom, awaited those leaders of the forlorn hope. When it was tolerated it soon became corrupted from its Divine simplicity.

Passing over the dark ages we come to the harbingers of the reformation, till we reach Luther, who was a leader of a forlorn hope, a bold champion for buried truths, a noble witness against the corruptions of Rome. As witness, when he said he would go to Worms, though there were as many devils to oppose him as tiles upon the houses.

You see your calling, brethren, "not many wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble," have part in this calling: it is the weak and the despised that God hath chosen to be the leaders of this forlorn hope. "Orthodox" Christianity in our day has a grand halo of respectability cast around it, endowed and established by the State, or built up into powerful denominations, with their Colleges, and vested interests. It stands now hoary with years—rich in blessed memories of myriads of sleeping saints as well as living ones—though as taught it is largely tainted with traditions of the Elders, and sadly diluted with Pagan philosophies; some of its grand distinctive truths ignored altogether, and others quite distorted from their Scriptural connection.

Do you, brethren and sisters, accept our position as witnesses for some of the forgotten, the ignored, despised, and rejected truths of God's holy Word? We are honored of our Lord to have had these truths brought home to our understandings. Now suffer the word of exhortation. Do you accept the solemn responsibilities of our sacred trust? Dare we keep silence when our Father's name is dishonored, as the God that dooms Immortal souls to endless torment in hell?—When our Glorious Redeemer is robbed of the brightest Jewel in his redemption crown, viz.: that of Life Giver to all those who without this priceless gift must die and cease to be. Can you allow the illusion to pass unchallenged —that the Church's Mission is to convert the World—while it distorts the truth of the nature of Christ's kingdom—making it to be the Church, or work of grace in the individual, rather than that rule of righteousness and peace, in the territory under the whole heavens. Are we agreed on these neglected, and, some of them, despised truths,—nay, some of them regarded as heresies? I say, are we agreed that it is our Mission to witness to them, as well as others we have not named? Have you, dear brethren, sat down and counted the cost? the loss of status, friendships, and church honors? Are you willing to have your fellowship with the the world's nobodies, but Christ's heroes? It involves sacrifice of various kinds. It is never likely to be a financial success. It is a credit enterprise. The recompense —the dividend—is not until the resurrection of the just. Are we prepared like Moses rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of modern Christianity? Do we esteem the present reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of the Laodicean Church? These are matters betwixt the Lord and ourselves, and they must be fully set forth, dear friends, if we are to be leaders of the forlorn hope.

It is one, Apostasy has set in, judgment clouds are gathering, the perils of the last days are appearing; we are they on whom the ends of the ages are come. And our Lord asks the question—When he cometh shall he find the faith on the earth? Now, beloved, if we have thus consecrated ourselves to the Lord and his truth, burnt the bridges, drawn the sword of truth and thrown away the sheath, then foot to foot, and to shoulder to shoulder let us follow our great Commander, in evil report, in reproach or in honor, assured that none of our labor shall be in vain in the Lord.

And now, in conclusion, for a few words of cheer. And, first of all, let us claim our Birthright privilege, beloved, "Now are we the sons of God:" "Accepted in the Beloved:" "Christ loved us and gave himself for us:" "Ye are the messengers of the churches and the glory of Christ." Your battle is the Lord's. "Put on the whole Armor of God:" "Go in the strength of the Lord God." Let the memories of past success strengthen faith and courage. Hundreds, thousands, have more or less accepted the precious truth. But few thoughtful preachers continue to libel our Father's character, that he will keep the wicked in hell to torment them forever. You little know the extent of good your testimony has done. But it is imperative that it be followed up: Cheer, brethren, cheer! Our work is in the trenches:—

"Spare not toil, nor blood, nor pain,
Not a stroke descends in vain;
Wounded, still no foot we yield
On this ancient battle-field.
More than Conquerors, even now,
With the war-sweat on our brow;
Onward, o'er the well-marked road,
March we as the host of God."

A little longer and our work is done. Our great Captain will come and lead us to the grand triumph of victory. Our forlorn hope shall end in final and everlasting triumph. Look, brethren, and read in yonder heavens the order, "Hold the fort, for I am coming: Jesus signals still." Let us "Wave the answer back to heaven: by thy grace we will."—Thomas Vasey, at Birmingham Conference.

"Woe to the Bloody City."

Among the curiosities of the Pennsylvania Museum on exhibition in Memorial Hall, Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, is one of the medals that was struck off by order of Pope Gregory XIII. in commemoration of the massacre of Protestants in France on the eve of St. Bartholomew's Day, Aug. 24, 1572. About 50,000 Protestants were murdered. The Pope celebrated the event by a grand procession and Te Deum, and the proclamation of a year of jubilee, and struck the medal that we have mentioned above.—Herald of Life.

In our small cabinet of curiosities we have, reproduced in bronze by the American Association of Numismatics, a fac simile of this Massacre-Medal of St. Bartholomew,— a description of which we copy from the Numismatic Pilot of Feb. 1877:

"Obverse. Face of the Pope, Gregory XIII, to the left, with pontifical cowl, hood and cloak. This is the celebrated Pontiff, who as the successor of Julius Cæsar, Pontifex Maximus, reformed the calendar as we now have it: [including the method of adjusting the leap-years so as to harmonize the civil year with the solar.]

"Inscription (abbreviated): Gregorius XIII. Pont. Max. An. I. (Supplied), Gregorius 13. Pontifex Maximus. Anno Primo; 'Gregory 13, High Priest (or Pope) in the first year' of his reign, viz. A. D. 1572. In the Exergue are the letters P. P., probably the initials of the artist.

"Reverse. The destroying Angel, gradient to the right; bearing in her left hand a cross, in her right a sword. Before her is a flying and prostrate band of Huguenots of both sexes and of various ages.

"Inscription: Vgonottorvm strages, 1572. The slaughter of the Huguenots, 1572. In all Greek and Roman medals we have found no group of human figures expressing horror and despair like this."

Dr. Dowling, in his History of Romanism, brought down to 1863, says (p. 490):—"A new issue of this celebrated medal in honor of the Bartholomew massacre has recently been struck from the Papal mint at Rome, and sold for the profit of the Papal government." Thus showing that the apostate Church had not up to that date repented of her complicity in the horrible slaughter perpetrated by the civil power of France—one of the ten kingdoms of the fourth prophetic empire, but rather gloried in it. For a thousand years or more it was the practice of the Popes to commemorate important events in the history of the Papacy by striking medals and coins; but since about 1870, through a loss of secular dominion, the Popes have ceased to coin money. In spirit and effort the Papal Hierarchy is however as antichristian as ever; and is leaving nothing undone that it can do, to secure again the reins of State and drive its deadly daggers into the bodies and souls of men. But our hope is in the return of the true Christ to destroy antichrist; and in the words of Charles Wesley we say:

"Yet, we know our Lord will come—
Smite the Antichrist of Rome;
All his plagues and judgments pour,
Earth accurst with fire devour.
But the curse shall soon remove
But the incarnate God of love,
Sitting on his throne, shall shout
Earth renewed to Heaven below."

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "8" and reads "Jny8" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1888. "Feb" February, "Mar" March "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June, "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

HE RESTORETH MY SOUL.

I am often so weary of sorrow,
So weary of struggling with sin,
So timid concerning the morrow,
So faithless of entering in
To the beautiful rest that remaineth
Secure in the city of God,
Where shall enter no evil that profaneth,
Nor even the spoiler hath trod.

But aye when the struggle is sorest,
And dark are the clouds on my soul,
Dear Lord, the sweet cup that Thou pourest
Has balm, and I drink and am whole.
From the quenchless old well of salvation
I quaff the pure waters divine,
And a sense of triumphant elation
Is thrilled through this spirit of mine.

No hand but thine own, blessed Master,
Could comfort and cheer in the day
When the touch of a sudden disaster
Has cumbered and tangled the way.
No look but Thine own could illumine
When night gathers black o'er the land,
And strength that is failing and human
Lies prone on the desolate strand.

But ever thy help is the nearest
When help from the earth there is none,
And near the word that is dearest
Is the word of the Crucified Son;
And aye when the tempest-clouds gather
I fly for sweet shelter and peace
Through the Son to the heart of the Father,
The terror and tremor shall cease.

He restoreth my soul, and I praise Him
Whose love is my chorus and crown;
He restoreth my soul; let me raise Him
A song that his mercy will own.
For often so weary of sorrow,
So weary of fighting with sin,
I looked and I long for the morrow
When the ransom'd their freedom shall win.

A Pleasant Trip and Visit. No. 4.

The memories of nearly thirty years ago crowded upon me as I looked upon, and trod the streets of Cleveland, Ohio. There, when on my wedding trip, we stopped and spent two days, enjoying ourselves as newly married folks are apt to! Then, there were none in that city, that I knew of, who sympathized with me in the hope I then had, and which, thank the Lord, I have never let go of! Then, there was not much city beyond the Public Square, and no city railroads, if I remember aright. But now, how changed; in every direction almost, these modern luxuries, purchased at the cost of a "nickel," as they say in these parts, can be obtained. What a growth of the far famed Euclid Avenue, with its elegant homes and well kept lawns; its many and beautiful trees! All these seemed as though in their combination, sufficient to complete the happiness of man or woman; and while I looked upon these I could but believe, there was a "skeleton" in many of these homes, and gladly would the occupants exchange residences and conditions with the more humble in life and situation! There I thought it eminently true, "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things he is in possession of."

I would not have any believe I looked upon these with envy; nor would I have any believe that only true happiness is found in the home of the humble in life! "All sorts and conditions of men" have a relative bearing, and it is as true today as ever it was. "What is one man's meat, is another man's poison;" and it seems to me, as I view the relations we as a people bear to the faith and hope of the gospel of God's dear Son, that we should raise our voices and pens with personal effort, and living example, to crowd down, and out of existence, this crying evil! And were we sufficiently careful to lay to our hearts the Scriptural advice to "avoid the appearance of evil," we should in this, as also in our home, business and church relations, lead happier and more useful lives.

I have no intention, were I capable of so doing, to "write up" Cleveland; and I simply desire, as with open eyes, and to profit withal, that what little of information I possess I may add thereto, making it portable, and to be drawn on in the future, as time and opportunity may afford.

I could but wish while in this beautiful city, that anthracite coal were used here instead of bituminous, for, at times, the very sky is obscured on account of the smoke belching forth from factory smoke shafts as well as from the chimneys of ten thousand houses; but I am told by old residents, this is nothing when you are used to it! And I suppose it is so, even as the old fish woman said with reference to the skinning of eels!

It is is a common saying, and is true, there are no advantages without some corresponding disadvantage, and in this consists one at least of the lessons of life.

Having made reference to the city itself, I will acquaint my readers of the character of the "Church of God." Do not anticipate me and think I am going into a detailed account of the individual character of each constituting that church; by no manner of means! I can say of this church, as I gather the fact from old members, they have never yet had what is termed a "split," and this is indeed a most gracious and commendable characteristic. I would it were so elsewhere, and am greatly of the opinion that schisms need rarely be, if the animating spirit of those who have entered into covenant relations was of the Christlike character! Submission and obedience to the higher law of love over law would always tend towards cementing in one body the "called, chosen and faithful." I am well aware, as we all should be, that so long as differences of our individual make up exists, so long must there be a looking at questions of doctrine from differing standpoints. We are required to be wise according to that which has come to us, dictated by the spirit of God, and not to be wise in our own conceits, having Israel of old as an example.

One word here as to creeds. I am not aware that the church in Cleveland have committed themselves to any such thing, and if they have, the sooner they give it the burning flames the better for them! Nevertheless, I am assured, because of their good order, they, as we all must, if we desire to put a bold front face to the enemy, have an agreed-to belief; and good order is best promoted on the principle, "He is governed best who is governed least."

It has been my happiness for many years to visit from time to time this healthy church, and I have seen their numbers increased, and their faithfulness in matters of the one faith and hope, I dare not question, because I have no grounds for so doing. I was very much pleased, as I looked around, while offering a word of exhortation, to see so many young men and women of the number. These I trust are now schooling themselves to take hold of the work before them, that of making known by life and sound doctrine the things pertaining to the kingdom of God and name of Jesus Christ; not touching these things as an abstraction, but as having a force which has life in it! My acquaintance with some of the brethren and sisters has been more intimate than with others; this I could not avoid, as circumstances have seemed to throw us together, but I can say that from one and all I have always found the charity commended by Paul.

While visiting at Brother McLeechlan's I had the pleasure of renewing the acquaintance of our veteran Brother and Sister G. W. Cherry. I first made his acquaintance over twenty years ago, and only once or twice have I met him since then. He is now seventy-eight years old, and is subject to the feebleness of age, intensified from several falls and hurts received in recent years. Yet I was pleased to hear him say, and his beloved wife echo the words, his hope was never more bright, and his faith in the living Christ as the Author of life, future, never more complete! Our talk was not of men so much, as of that which rejoices the heart, and makes us glad.

My visit at our dear Brother and Sister L. C. Cattell was, as it always had been, very pleasant. Our talk was of present duties and delights, and concerning the great future known to Jehovah, and in part revealed to us. The great outlines of the future are well marked; the details are in reserve but which shall burst upon us in the "age of the ages," filling space and time as he best knows! Here I rest my hope, and desire not to be wise above that which is written. The mind of Jehovah needs no revising, and this "once have I sworn unto David" is to me an end of all controversy; I can comprehend and understand this, but "Elpis Israels"—"Eureka's"—Lectures, be they many or few, being the work of man, are constantly needing revision. God Almighty is jealous of his word, and I fear to write almost on questions about which there is yet great diversity of belief, or opinion, call it which you may, lest I add to his words and deceive some thereby. Authors take upon themselves great responsibilities!

My visit at Collinswood, the home of my dear Bro. and Sr. G. Elton, was, as it had ever been, joyous! We found time to read the Scriptures together, to bow the knee, and call on the name of the Holy One, in the name of Jesus. Our visit was short, but long to be remembered. Bro. J. T. Smith and wife contemplate removal from Collinswood to the Western slopes of San Buenaventura, or Los Angeles, or somewhere in that mild and equable climate; their health requires the change; and while it is hoped they may secure this boon of boons, those they leave behind will miss a most skillful physician, surgeon, and one who has ever graced the walks of Christian virtue; may heaven's blessing attend them is the prayer of all who know them!

I have not yet done with the church in Cleveland! It has a membership of over fifty, who as a rule make it a point to be in their places every Sunday at 10.30.

The church is organized according to the law of apostolic recommendation, and is also according to the laws of the State, in this I think I am correct! The Elders are well chosen, and serve alternatively; one of these is Bro. G. Elton, who, so far as I can judge has all the necessary qualifications of an evangelist, and so long as he is not in this field of usefulness, so long the church suffers loss. There are outlying posts in various parts of the State, where such a man—a better one than he if to be obtained—can fill in a good amount of time in declaring a pure and simple gospel. We need men who are qualified for this work, and who will hold themselves aloof from party spirit, whose characters are always first class! Such, I feel assured can gain admission to the hearts and consciences of those who now know not God, not having believed the gospel and not having obeyed. The field is the world! It is not Cleveland nor Brooklyn, it is not London nor Paris, it is the world!!

And now, after an absence from home of five weeks, here I am in the family circle, happy in being here, and happy in the experiences gained in my recent trip from Brooklyn, N. Y., to Scranton, Pa., Watson, Mich., Canton, Ohio, Salem, Fairmon, and Cleveland, Ohio. Tomorrow I hope to meet in fellowship, breaking of bread and prayers, the "Church of God" and with those whose names I trust are written in heaven, hold sweet communion.

THE COMING AGE,
IN
Nature and Proximity.
—BY J. P. WEETHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are inquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the character of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, politics, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom, and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

Dear Restitution:

Being so far on my return lecturing tour to Cleveland, Toronto, Ont., and also to other northern cities, allow me to sketch my visit to certain districts in south-eastern Ohio, particularly in Athens and Meigs Counties. It is well to note such events as may be of interest to such as desire to learn the state of affairs where the reign of Messiah and his life have been the topic of inquiry, and special investigation.

A meeting was held near my Millfield home in what is called Green's Run meeting house; it being a church of the Disciples, which, though some years since, it had been full and prosperous, was dwindled to one of weakness and inefficiency. A minister of the order of Bible Christians, had drawn away from its membership. His effort, aided by removals and death, laid the congregation in ruins, scarcely any efficient members remain. The edifice was good. In the summer I was invited by two persons, not members of the church, to commence preaching. I spoke as often as my circumstances would permit. A congregation was gathered; a Sabbath school formed, and kept up. During my long absence in Canada and in northern cities, the exercises continued. On my return, I immersed four persons; and our meetings were attended with considerable interest. The congregation is made up principally of youth. A large and interesting field is gradually opening.

They will sustain the meetings during my absence, and, I trust, a harvest of youth will soon be added to their increasing numbers.

A few persons gather to their meetings who (though females) are efficient workers. Their names are well known in their community.

This church is in a mining region, and is therefore well calculated to be a future centre of very extended usefulness.

This church has had a remarkably varied history. In the early years of the Advent movement I labored in this valley (Sunday Creek) many years, and with some considerable success.

For a number of years I had but little opposition. During one series of meetings, held in three localities, touching each other, I immersed over fifty persons. On my leaving, other ministers, hostile to our views, came in and gathered most of the converts into the churches of the Disciples. By degrees they worked up a hostile feeling and the fruits of our labors were diverted from our views.

This valley will be one of great value, and should by no means be neglected. Its resources in mineral wealth, are exceedingly great. It has heavy deposits of limestone, iron ore, and stone coal.

The coal deposits excell all others in the State, averaging in two veins not less than about 12 feet, villages spring up at every shaft. There will soon be almost one continual town from the mouth of the Sunday Creek to its sources. This mining population will require the labors of many missionaries. The population will be composed of all nationalities of the old world where Christianity exists principally in the name, and the saloon is the most popular institution.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVI. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, NOVEMBER 16, 1887. NO. 43.

I made three trips into Meigs County which extends to the Ohio river. There is a Church of God near Middleport, in what is called the Bradford Neighborhood. Their meeting house (Church house) was dedicated to the worship of God many years since. Since that dedication (in which I officiated) I have made the congregation many pleasant and profitable visits. It has always been, what is termed, a live congregation; it sustaining preaching, and keeping alive other church institutions. The original members of the Bradford church are very intelligent in the Scriptures. Their ordinary services are interesting and unusually instructive. Two at least, of the young married members, could readily instruct as public ministers of the truth, provided their domestic affairs would allow it. This church has had its trials through the conduct of the Free Methodist denomination, ignorant, dogmatic and exceeding aggressive. They have however, come out of the fire purified, and strengthened. That whole district has heard our views, and have become more or less familiar with our doctrine, and, in many instances friendly to them. On the whole, the doctrines of the Advent and eternal life through Christ are decidedly on the advance. We have a field that should be fully occupied, and, if well cultivated, would yield a plentiful harvest. Two brothers, ministers, (Riley and Lu. Pickens) have done a great work among the people and members of other denominations throughout a large scope of country in south-eastern Ohio.

They are intelligent in the Scriptures, bold, fearless, and very acceptable teachers, and ministers of the word. Bro. O. Tinker, has been doing some very good work. Though his knowledge of our views is rather limited. With more application to reading and investigation of the Scriptures relative to the return and reign of Messiah, he may become a useful proclaimer of the special messages of our age.

One difficulty stands in the way of some of our teachers, who are fully bent on getting all the money they can, by their religious instructions. To do this they labor for those congregations which pay the best. In this manner they are tempted to suit their teachings to the tastes of their hearers rather than to God. They become all things to all men.

Such ministers have one lesson yet to learn, to obey God rather than man. If they are the servants of Christ, it is their duty to teach the doctrines which Christ and his apostles taught.

Much advent truth is kept back from the people by those who are resolved to lend themselves to such a damaging compromising policy.

As long as they are not thrust out of the churches, they lend their efforts to sustain false views of the doctrines of Christianity. Messiah's return and reign; and the preparing of the people for those events, are the great duties of the religious teachers of our age.

I delivered two public discourses in the Disciples' church in Middleport. I think that they will result finally, in opening that place and its neighbor Pomeroy, on the Ohio river, to hear the truth more fully.

Those two towns (cities) contain about 12,000 inhabitants, they are in the great coal and salt region. At this time the coal and salt interests are down. Such has been the drouth of the season, that the river is useless, it being nearly bottom upwards.... Towns along that great river are now in a state bordering on destitution. Rail roads, however, will soon obviate the sufferings consequent of these water deficiencies. Some time again, perhaps in the early part of winter, I may be called to deliver a full course of lectures in Middleport or in Pomeroy, or in both. Should such be the result of our visit to that city, it may be productive of much future good.

Visiting Athens I received from the Ohio University (my Alma Mater) and from the public citizens, such as Judges Legislators, Editors, Congressmen, ex-secretary of State, etc., the highest testimonials of character, literary worth and ability as an author and lecturer to be used by me as an introduction to our large cities and other localities, when on my lecturing tours.

On the 27th Ult. I left Millfield, on my northern trip to Cleveland and Toronto, where I am invited to lecture on those subjects contained in my work on the Prophecies.

So far are my works in advance of the age that I find it difficult to draw their attention from the affairs of the age to coming events. The seen things are sufficient to enlist all their energies.

I could most devoutly wish that this mental state could only be appropriately applied to men of the world. Members of the popular churches are very generally absorbed in worldly matters, equally, perhaps, with those business men that make no profession of Christianity.

That day, therefore, will come upon them also, as a snare. From my own observation, many of our own people take but little interest in the doctrine of the coming of the Lord. They have families growing up, to be educated, and provided for, a living to make, and homes to make comfortable. These things, aided by the old Adamic current, cause them to float along the shores of this age, fishing out the products which add to their worldly affections, while they keep out of view the beauties, the life and the glories of the coming age. I spent the last Sabbath at Millersburgh, the county seat of Holmes County. I was there invited to speak in the Methodist church to a Methodist audience. They listened with much interest. I may return there again. The people know nothing about the Coming and reign of Messiah. Could they hear many would believe. On Monday night I arrived in this city, where I am called to open their new church.

THE PAPACY AND THE MAN OF SIN NOT IDENTICAL.—No. 4.

Not a few prophetical students teach that the seven heads of the beast are so many forms of government. In an article by W. Lewis, in the Christian Lamp, he says, "That these seven heads denoted seven forms of government is evident, for in verses 9 and 10 of the chapter just quoted these words occur, 'The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth, and these are seven kings.' Now the very reason here given to show that the seven heads denote seven forms of government, we induce to show that they do not. There may be forms of government under those heads differing somewhat one from another, but the phrase here used is not designed to denote them. The seven heads, it is said, are seven kings; and in chap. xiii. where this beast with seven heads is treated of, it declares that one of the heads, or kings, was smitten, or slain, by the stroke of the sword; and his death-stroke was healed. Now any one may see how incongruous it would be to speak of a form of government being smitten by the stroke of the sword. Inspired writers do not thus blunder in the use of figures. The pronouns his, and him, used of this head, or king, confirm our statement, that the seven heads are not forms of government, but kings, as, indeed, the passage says; or men, who will exercise kingly rule, and each in his turn be the head of the beast, or the great world-power.

Prior to his having the death-stroke of the sword, he is one "of the seven;" but when his "death-stroke" is healed, he "is himself also an eighth." Remarking on the horn of Dan. vii., and this peculiar phrase, Geo. N. K. Peters says, 'He is not precisely an eighth head, having a relationship to the seventh, but has special characteristics of his own which, in one aspect, gives him a certain independency, and yet, in another, shows him to be virtually a seventh-eighth head, i.e., in some respects a seventh, and in others an eighth head."

At this healing of the deadly wound, or living again of this seventh head, or king, John teaches that the whole earth will wonder after him; but if it was simply the falling and rising again of some form of government, there would be nothing in that to excite the wonder of the whole earth. Things of that kind have happened without exciting much wonder. But there will be something really astounding, something to make the world wonder with a great amazement, when this king, the antichrist, shall be fatally smitten by the sword, and then miraculously healed, the healing doubtless by Satanic power.

The miracles which will be performed by the antichrist will astonish and perplex men, and lacking Christian principle and the Spirit's guidance, they will be deceived by them and render him homage. They will also be alarmed and awed into sinful submission by his cruel persecution of the faithful.

It is worthy of notice that as the first king of the Gentiles set up an image to claim worship, so the last great leader of Gentile power will also claim worship, and will set up an image in order to enforce it.

Those who worship the beast, etc., "Shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God," which is contained in the seven bowls, Rev. xvi. 1. The pouring out of these bowls, therefore, is yet future. This is certain; for this worship of the beast and his image, and the receiving a mark on the forehead or upon the hand, cannot take place till the manifestation of the beast in its last head.

Those who advocate the view that the Revelation has been fulfilled, or mostly fulfilled, endeavor to enumerate the ten kingdoms. Numerous lists have been made out by commentators and prophetical students, who have taken the historic view, most of them lacking in agreement one with the other. But these are made out in such a way that the number might be easily increased. Indeed, on the principle they have adopted, they might have reckoned up twice ten, for various kingdoms have risen up during the divided state of the fourth great world-power. In the most reliable histories of the Roman empire, men fail to find ten kingdoms existing at one time, no fewer and no more, and yet among them another horn coming up who plucks up by the roots three of the other horns, or kings, and the head of those kingdoms. This blundering shows that they have been on the wrong track; that they have been looking for them where they are not to be found, in the past, instead of in the future.

But the course and the doings of the man of sin and his allies, though terrible, will be short. At the Advent of Christ, when he comes with the armies of heaven, to smite the nations and deliver his people, the beast and the false prophet will be "cast alive into the lake of fire that burneth with brimstone." And while the followers of the antichrist are meeting with their doom, while destruction is coming upon them, the penitent and believing among the Jews, or a remnant of Israel, are delivered. They will hide themselves in their chambers while Jehovah is meting out punishment to the wicked inhabitants. After that, Satan will be bound for a thousand years; after the thousand years, he will be loosed for a little season, and ultimately he will be cast into the lake of fire, where the beast and the false prophet were previously cast. And this is clear evidence that Christ's coming to the earth is before the Millennium. While Satan is at large and exercises his power in tempting men to sin, we need not look for the promised reign of righteous and blessedness.

SILAS HENN.

SCHOLLS FERRY, Ore.

Dear Restitution:

Some weeks ago I read the inquiry, "Where are the little infants?" and our dear Editor echoed the same. So have I wondered and asked myself, where are they? Why do we not have more of them? Like myself, perhaps, the authors of them feel that they cannot interest people, like the greater lights. But I love to read them; they tell me of those that live in different parts of the country, perhaps far away from those of like faith, that they too love our dear Savior, the blessed Redeemer. My mind of late has been greatly troubled about the great use of tobacco. Now to come right to the subject, why is it that so many of the members of the Church of God use the noxious weed. The use of tobacco is getting very great in the United States, not only with the worldly people, but this terrible habit is in the church. When I talk to young boys about this filthy practice they point out to me members of the church, yes, even ministers of the gospel of Christ.

Now my brethren, this ought not so to be. We ought not to do anything, or put a stumbling block, "or an occasion to fall in our brother's way." It seems to me that the use of tobacco is a sin; if so how can we say we are clean, and claim the promise that we shall be kings and priests unto God and the Father? We censure the poor drunkard because he does not abstain from the cup, and quote Scripture to him about the sin of intemperance, and forget that we are using a filthy weed that very often leads to the wine glass.

Arouse ye men in God's own name,
To worthy deeds the land inflame,
Abstain from this dread foe,
Unfurl the flag and hang it high
To stream along yon azure sky,
For God would have it so.

Leave not the young to slavery's doom,
Strike from our land the curse; when done
You will then feel more like men:
Ah! some have received trophies proved
Where tobacco's host victorious moved,
And lost their diadem.

God speed the bright and glorious day,
When all false deeds are swept away,
And his own wisdom shine.
When loud thanksgiving fills the air,
When all shall lift their hearts in prayer,
To majesty divine.

An Afternoon Tea in Jerusalem.

If there be one place told of in Holy Writ, if there be one spot in this land of wondrous memories, which brings home to the follower of Christ a more individualized idea of his earthly pilgrimage than any other, that spot is the Mount of Olives. There is no doubting here, no questioning whether the ground on which you are standing may not have been called "the mount" by some Byzantine Sophia, whether traditions respecting it can go farther back than the days of Constantine, whether, in truth, this is the hill over which Jesus walked when he traveled from Bethany to fulfill his mission in the Temple.

The garden of Gethsemane, over the brook Kedron, where he left his disciples while he went farther for that last agonizing prayer; the hill-side on which the divine strength came to him, and where the multitude came to take him; Bethany, the town of Mary and Martha, where Lazarus was raised from the dead; the spot whence he sent for the ass's colt; the path thence to the city by which he rode when the multitude cried, "Hosanna to the Son of David!"—the same multitude which afterwards came out against him with swords and staves,—all these are there beyond even the doubting of the unbelievers who assail the sacred sites.

This is the Mount of Olives; this water-channel, whose bed is almost dry, is the brook Kedron; and the hamlet on the other side is the veritable Bethany. Cavilers are silent before these, the true holy places of Jerusalem,—places for which the Greeks and Latins do not fight; places guarded by no turbaned Turk; places which need no official firman to enter,—open to all men under the heavens, and desolate enough to any one who will come to sit there and meditate on the wondrous history of the city which lies over against him. Wondrous indeed, so close it seems that you might put out your hand and touch it; but lying between is the valley of Jehoshaphat, where the Jews long to lay their bones,—for there, according to them, is the site of the resurrection, and those who patiently go thither in their old age, and die there, can there be buried. Thus they save themselves the pilgrimage when the last trump shall sound, and shall be the first to rise when they shall be summoned once more to the upper world.

Before us lay the walls, rising up erect from the hill-side,—for the city is still a fenced one,—stretching from hill to hill in one varying but continuous line. Here facing us is Mount Moriah, where Solomon built the house of the Lord, where Abraham offered his costly sacrifice, where Jehovah appeared unto David before the altar which he had reared on the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite. For this city had been in still more ancient days, before the Promised Land had been given to the sons of Abraham, the city Jebus,—a city even then fenced up, and inhabited by a warlike race. And here was the threshing-floor which Araunah offered to David without money and without price, but which the king had bought for fifty shekels of silver. "Shall I serve my God with that which costs me nothing?" was the indignant answer of the king to the offer of the Jebusite.

The Canaanite Tribe has perished from the face of the earth; the Temple, "exceeding magnificent, the glory of the whole earth," has disappeared, not one stone being left upon another, and in its place stands the Mosque of the Prophet. On the threshing-floor of Araunah the children of Muhammad chant the Quran and sing praises to Allah; and there on the pinnacle of the dome shall Muhammad himself stand to judge the earth. What a change from the treading of the Jebusite oxen to the mussein call to prayer! "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem!" is the not silent, but outspoken, thought with which we stretched our hand over the city, as one could not fail to do in that spot; "O Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto you! ....Behold how your house is left unto you desolate."

The short twilight of the Syrian evening fell upon us, and we slowly turned and took our way down the hill, thinking of the weary feet that had so often trodden that toilsome way. As we picked our steps among the tombs with which the steep incline is so thickly set, we heard our names called, and, looking up in astonishment, found a party of ladies and gentlemen coming across the hill from Bethany, and recognized in them friends whom we had known years ago in America. They were overjoyed to see us, had heard from home that we were on our way, and had been looking out for us. Would we not come and stay with them, and see how they had imported American home life to Jerusalem? or, if not, we must come and take tea. The invitation to tea was accepted with pleasure, and the next afternoon started out from the hotel, but presently found ourselves so lost in the maze of the narrow streets or lanes that we were forced to come back for a guide. In a handsome house, for Jerusalem, but queer and quaint to our American eyes, we found L'Americaine Colonel, as they are called. The house is just inside the Damascus gate, and was built for a Muhammadan harem by a wealthy Musulman.

They are a settlement in themselves, a peculiar people, and anywhere but in Jerusalem would be the subject of comment and remark; but the Holy City is the rendezvous for so many curious phases of religious belief that everything is accepted, and nothing is singularly enough to excite more than a passing comment.

The colony started from America about five years ago with ten members, who were told to come to Jerusalem, and there wait the coming of the Lord. In England they gained some accession, and, since coming here have had several others, so now they have twenty-five. Mr. S——, the temporal head as his wife is the spiritual one, was a well-known and leading lawyer in Chicago, and an elder in one of the churches. Some years ago, his attention was called to the faith-ours; and he gradually gave up his business, devoting his time to the study of prophesy, until, as he thought, in obedience to a Divine command, he left his home to come to Jerusalem, and here they have been ever since. They are directed in all their movements by a "thus saith the Lord" which comes through Mrs. S——, who is the spiritual ruler. She receives instructions as to every detail of life directly from the Lord,—sometimes through the Bible, a powerful agency, so calling her attention to some passage as to leave her in no doubt of the meaning, or else the voice comes directly to her ear. She feels, she says, "an extraordinary Divine agency working in me while I am giving instruction to others, whereby I am told what I shall write or speak."

They had expected the seal to be placed on their belief by some miraculous manifestations that were to take place. When Mr. S——stood on the Mount of Olives, the mount was to open, and a voice was to be heard.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR,

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months Subscriptions.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints associated with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for the salvation.

Even when that prophecy failed of fulfilment, there faith was not shaken. They had some plausible reason why this mistake had arisen. Theirs is not an aggressive faith. They do not care to convert any one to their ideas. "You do what the Lord tells you," they say, "and we will do what he tells us. Let us be friends." They are not missionaries, do no active work, but indirectly they do many works. Last winter, a waning tribe of Russian Jews came to Jerusalem. Just in the midst of the rainy season, without food and almost naked, they arrived, and encamped just outside of the Damascus gate. As soon as the colony found them out, all the clothing of the family not in actual use was sent to them, and every available vessel in the house was used in preparing soup. They divided everything with them, without knowing where another supply would come from; for they live by faith. The gratitude of the sufferers was touching. One woman, whose starving baby Mrs. S——had nursed back to life, came and asked if she might but kiss her feet. They took us through their rooms, which were bright and pretty, with carved olive-wood ornaments, pressed flowers; and home like decorations, on to the flat roof of the house; and there we, a company from the Western world, the very existence of which was unknown when Jerusalem was in glory, stood and watched the setting sun as it glided the glittering minaret of the great Mosque, lit up the twin domes of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and flashed into sight the distant bosom of the Salt Sea, while we talked of the new Jerusalem which should descend as a bride from heaven.

Mr. S——told us of his visit to the leper colony, where he had been that day to carry some alms sent from England. He said it made his heart sick to see the inexpressible melancholy of that race of mutilated pariahs, beggars and outcasts by inheritance, but still possessing souls that would give them the hope of glory if they could only be brought to realize it.

The tinkle of a bell called us down, and there in a large upper room were gathered about forty persons,—Jews, Muhammedans, and Christians; for the teas are informal, and all are welcomed. A small table at one end of the room held the tray with tea, edibles, bread, and jam. Their diet is prescribed for them. They said long ago they had been told to eat no meat, and latterly butter was given up in obedience to a command. Whether the failure of the means of living had anything to do with the proscription, of course we did not know. The ladies made the tea and the gentlemen handed it around, and the whole was very enjoyable. After it was over the table cleared away, books were distributed, and the evening was closed with the Gospel Songs, which are the links that bind together the whole Christian world in these services of song.

The Colonel knew every foot of the city as if it had been their native heath; and together we roamed through the Tyropœan Valley, explored the underground caverns where the great stones for the Temple were quarried, up the sides of Olivet, among the tombs of the kings, and gathered and pressed the wild-flowers that clothe the ruins with beauty; into the Church of the Sepulchre, where even the mummeries practiced cannot take away the spell of the place.

At last, and all too soon, we reluctantly turned our faces westward to the work that awaited us in the home land, leaving our friends behind to wait for the coming of the Lord. Where his coming will find us, matters little. How his coming will find us, matters much. "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch."—Sara Lee, in N. Y. Times.

THE fate of the condemned Anarchists is no longer a question in suspense. The Governor of Illinois commuted the sentence of two to imprisonment for life. One committed suicide in the jail, and four were executed according to the sentence pronounced by the court that first tried their case, which sentence was sustained by the higher courts. It was our supposition that the Governor might commute the sentence of one or two of the less guilty. The whole affair has been a sad chapter in human history.

FROM the Sunday School Times we take an article on Luther's work in translating the Bible. This is of importance to all Protestants because it was the commencement of the still greater work that it has since accomplished of giving God's word to the world in so many languages and dialects. This is in fulfillment of our Savior's prediction, and is by him made a sign of the nearing end of this gospel age. He says: "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness to all nations; and then shall the end come." Matt. xxiv. 14. Of the Sunday School Times we can say, that it is an excellent paper filled with contributions from able writers whose articles elucidate many difficult passages.

In this number we can do no more than briefly allude to our Conference here in Plymouth. We have had a good meeting indeed. The community favored our ministers with an attentive hearing while they presented some of the more important themes of the gospel hope; especially those themes concerning the saints' future inheritance that distinguish us in belief from the denominations of our times. Our little church in Plymouth has made arrangements to have meetings continue for a while longer in order to more fully present the features of our blessed hope more in detail, as well as to stir up the minds of believers with practical truths and exhortations from God's holy word. While a correct theory is of great importance, it nevertheless remains true that God demands the heart. Even our intelligent obedience is only valuable when rendered as resulting from affectionate love. In praise of the Roman brethren Paul says, "Ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you." Rom. vi. 17.

Selections.

Luther as a Translator of the Bible.

The richest fruit of Luther's leisure on the Wartburg, and the most important and useful work of his whole life, is the translation of the New Testament, by which he brought the teaching and example of Christ and the apostles to the mind and heart of the Germans in life-like reproduction. It was a republication of the gospel. He made the Bible the people's book in church, schools, and house. If he had done nothing else, he would be one of the greatest benefactors of the German-speaking race.

His version was followed by Protestant versions in other languages, especially the French, Dutch, and English. Hereafter the Reformation depended no longer on the works of the Reformers, but on the book of God, which everybody could read for himself as his daily guide in spiritual life. This inestimable blessing, of an open Bible for all alike as language advance in Church history, and can never be lost.

Luther was not the first, but by far the greatest, translator of the German Bible, and is as inseparably connected with it as Jerome is with the Latin Vulgate. He threw the old translations into the shade and out of use, and has not been surpassed, or even equaled, by a successor. There are more accurate versions for scholars (as those of De Wette and Weizsacker), but none that can rival Luther's for popular use.

Luther had a rare combination of gifts for a Bible translator,—familiarity with the original languages, perfect mastery over the vernacular, faith in the revealed word of God, enthusiasm for the gospel, unction of the Holy Spirit. A good translation must be both true and free, faithful and idiomatic, so as to read like an original work. This is the case with Luther's version. Besides, he had already acquired such fame and authority that his version at once commanded universal attention.

His knowledge of Greek and Hebrew was only moderate, but sufficient to enable him to form an independent judgment. What he lacked in scholarship was supplied by his intuitive genius and the help of Melanchthon. In the German tongue he had no rival. He created, as it were, or gave shape and form to, the modern High German. He combined the official language of the government with that of the common people. He listened, as he says, to the speech of the mother at home, the children in the street, the men and women in the market, the butcher and various tradesmen in their shops, and "looked them on the mouth," in pursuit of the most intelligible terms. His genius for poetry and music enabled him to reproduce the rhythm and melody, the parallelism and symmetry, of Hebrew poetry and prose. His crowning qualification was his intuitive insight and spiritual sympathy with the contents of the Bible.

Luther was gradually prepared for this work. He found for the first time a complete copy of the Latin Bible in the University Library at Erfurt, to his great delight, and made it his chief study. He derived from it theology and spiritual nourishment; he lectured and preached on it as professor at Wittenberg day after day. He acquired the knowledge of the original languages for the purpose of its better understanding. He liked to call himself a "Doctor of the Sacred Scriptures."

He began with the New Testament in November or December, 1521, and completed it in the following March, before he left the Wartburg. He thoroughly revised it on his return to Wittenberg, with the effectual help of Melanchthon, who was a much better Greek scholar. Sturz at Erfurt was consulted about coins and measures. Spalatin furnished from the electoral treasury names for the precious stones of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21). The translation was then hurried through three presses, and appeared as soon as September 21, 1523, but without his name.

He at once proceeded to the more difficult task of translating the Old Testament, and published it in parts as they were ready.

In the progress of the work he founded a Collegium Biblicum, or Bible club, consisting of his colleagues, Melanchthon, Bugenhagen, Cruciger, Justus Jonas, and Aurogallus. They met once a week in his house, several hours before supper. Deacon George Rorer, the first clergyman ordained by Luther, and his proof-reader, was also present. Occasionally foreign scholars were admitted, Jewish rabbis were freely consulted. Each member of the company contributed to the work from his special knowledge and preparation. Melanchthon brought with him the Greek Bible; Cruciger, the Hebrew and Chaldee; Bugenhagen, the Vulgate; others, the old commentators. Luther had always with him the Latin and the German versions, besides the Hebrew. Sometimes they sparely mastered three lines of the Book of Job in four days, and hunted two, three, and four weeks for a single word. No record exists of the discussions of this remarkable company; but Mathesius says that "wonderfully beautiful and instructive speeches were made."

At last the whole Bible—including the Apocrypha as "books not equal to the Holy Scriptures, yet useful and good to read"—was completed in 1534, and printed with numerous woodcuts.

In the meantime the New Testament had appeared in sixteen or seventeen editions and in over fifty reprints.

Luther complained of the many errors in these irresponsible editions.

He never ceased to amend his translation. Besides correcting errors, he improved the orthography, fixed the inflections, purged the vocabulary of obscure and ignoble words, and made the whole symmetrical and melodious.

He prepared five original editions, or recensions, of his whole Bible, the last in 1545, a year before his death. This is the proper basis of all critical editions.

The edition of 1546 was prepared by his friend Rorer, and contains a large number of alterations, which he traced to Luther himself. Some of them are real improvements; for example, Die Liebe horet nimmer auf—"Love never ceases,"—for Die Liebe wird nicht mude—"Love never grows weary" (1 Cor. xiii. 18). The charge that he made the changes in the interests of Melanchthonism seems to be unfounded.

Luther's version of the Bible is a wonderful monument of genius, learning, and piety, and may be regarded in a secondary sense as inspired. It was, from beginning to end, a labor of love and enthusiasm. While publishers and printers made fortunes, Luther never received or asked a copper for this greatest work of his life.

We must judge it from the times. A German translation from the original languages was a work of colossal magnitude, if we consider the absence of good grammars, dictionaries, and concordances, the crude state of Greek and Hebrew scholarship and of the German language, in the sixteenth century. Luther wrote to Amsdorf, January 13, 1522, that he had undertaken a task beyond his power, that he now understood why no one had attempted it before to his own name, and that he would not venture on the Old Testament without the aid of his friends. He felt especially how difficult it was to make Job and the Hebrew prophets speak in barbarous German. He jocosely remarked that Job would have become more impatient at the blunders of his translators than at the long speeches of his "miserable comforters."

As regards the text, it was in an unsettled condition. The science of textual criticism was not yet born, and the materials for it were not yet collected from the manuscripts, ancient versions, and patristic quotations. Luther had to use the first printed editions. He had no access to manuscripts, the most important of which were not even discovered or made available before the middle of the nineteenth century. Biblical geography and archæology were in their infancy, and many names and phrases could not be understood at the time.

In view of these difficulties, we need not be surprised at the large number of mistakes, inaccuracies, and inconsistencies in Luther's version. They are most numerous in Job and the Prophets, who present, even to the advanced Hebrew scholars of our day, many unsolved problems of text and rendering. The English version of 1611 had the great advantage of the labors of three generations of translators and revisers, and is therefore more accurate, and yet equally idiomatic.

The basis for Luther's version of the Old Testament was the Masoretic text as published by Gerson Ben Moshah at Brescia in 1494. He used also the Septuagint, the Vulgate of Jerome (although he disliked him exceedingly, on account of his monkery), the Latin translations of the Dominican Sanctes Pagnini of Lucca (1527), and of the Franciscan Sebastian Munster (1534), the "Glossa ordinaria" (a favorite exegetical vade mecum of Walafried Strabo in the ninth century), and Nicolaus Lyra (d. 1340), the chief of Mediæval commentators, who, besides the fathers, consulted also the Jewish rabbis.

The basis for the New Testament was the second edition of Erasmus, published at Basel, in Switzerland, in 1519. His first edition of the Greek Testament had appeared in 1516, just one year before the Reformation. He derived the text from the Mediæval manuscripts. The second edition is disfigured by a large number of typographical errors. He laid the foundation of the Textus Receptus, which was brought into its mature shape by Stephanus, in his "royal edition" of 1550 (the basis of the English Textus Receptus), and which maintained the supremacy till Lachmann inaugurated the adoption of the older textual basis. Luther did not slavishly follow the Greek of Erasmus, and in many places conformed to the Latin Vulgate, which is based on an older text. He also omitted, even in his last edition, the famous interpolation of the heavenly witnesses in 1 John v. 7, which Erasmus inserted in his third edition (1522) against his better judgment.

The German language is divided into as many dialects as tribes and states, and none served as a bond of literary union. Saxon and Bavarians, Hanoverians and Swabians, could scarcely understand one another. Each author wrote in the dialect of his district, Zwingli in his Schweizerdutsch. "I have so far read no book or letter," says Luther in the preface to his version of the Pentateuch (1523), "in which the German language is properly handled. Nobody seems to care sufficiently for it; and every preacher thinks he has a right to change it at pleasure, and to invent new terms." Scholars preferred to write in Latin; and when they attempted to use the mother-tongue, as Reuchlin and Melanchthon did occasionally, they fell far below in ease and beauty of expression. Luther brought harmony out of this confusion, and made the modern High German the common book language. He chose as the basis the Saxon dialect, which was used at the Saxon court and in diplomatic intercourse between the Emperor and the states, but was bureaucratic, stiff, heavy, involved, dragging, and unwieldy. He popularized and adapted it to theology and religion. He enriched it with the vocabulary of the German mystics, chronicles, and poets. He gave it wings, and made it intelligible to the common people of all parts of Germany. He adapted and united the words to the capacity of the Germans, often at the expense of accuracy. He cared more for the substance than the form. He substituted even undeutsch (i) for "barbarian" in 1 Corinthians xiv. 11. He turned the Hebrew shekel into a silberling, the Greek drachma and Roman denarius into a German groschen, the quadrans into a heller, the Hebrew measures into scheffel, malter, tonne, centner, and the Roman centurion into a hauptmann. Still greater liberties he allowed himself in the Apocrypha, to make them more easy and pleasant reading. He used popular alliterative phrases; as "Gold und Gut," "Land und Leute," "Ruth und That," "Stecken und Stab," "Dornen und Disteln," "matt und mude," "gang und gabe." He avoided foreign terms, which rushed in like a flood with the revival of learning, especially in proper names (as Melanchthon for Schwarzerd, Aurifaber for Goldschmid, Oecolampadius for Hausschein, Camerarius for Kammermeister). He enriched the vocabulary with such beautiful words as holdselig, Gottseligkeit.

Erasmus Alber, a contemporary of Luther, called him the German Cicero, who not only reformed religion, but also the German language.

Luther's version is an idiomatic reproduction of the Bible in the very spirit of the Bible. It brings out the whole wealth, force, and beauty of the German language. It is the first German classic, as King James's version is the first English classic. It anticipated the golden age of German literature as represented by Klopstock, Lessing, Herder, Goethe, Schiller,—all of them Protestants, and more or less indebted to the Luther Bible for beauty and vigor of style. The best authority in Teutonic philology, Jacob Grimm, pronounces Luther's language to be the foundation of the new High German dialect on account of its purity and influence, and the Protestant dialect on account of its freedom, which conquered even Roman Catholic authors.—By Professor Philip Schaff, D.D., LL.D. in S. S. Times.

The Church of God and of Christ.

The Bible is the book for Protestants! and when I say "Protestants," I mean more than Anti-Catholics; and here I declare without fear of contradiction, that Jesus Christ at no time during his ministry established what now passes for the church! Development has always been the order of all God's movements, and I need not stop to argue this statement: for when Christ came, he came in the fulness of time, and it remained for him to first be proclaimed as Son of God, and afterwards to call around him those who should lengthen out the sound of his claims as the Messiah, as the Savior, his mission was rather iconoclastic than otherwise, and so far as I can discover she never constituted one disciple the superior of another, all alike were called with that calling which was holy. At no time did he constitute Peter the prince of the apostles, at no time did he make John a bishop, or James a deacon. It is true he called Simon, and Andrew and Philip and Bartholomew and the others as disciples, or followers, and after this he constitutes apostles or sent ones giving them their commission as recorded in Matt. x. He sent these disciples out with miraculous power, this same power remained in the church so long as it was deemed necessary. I find the first use of the word church is in Matt. xvi. 18. "Upon this rock," etc., and much as has been said on this question I can only understand it as Christ being the "Rock," chief corner stone "Stone of stumbling," and the confession necessary is to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah, Son of the living God; this I believe can most fully be sustained by an appeal to other Scriptures. A church, is simply a body of called out believers! "All ye are brethren." I now come to the main feature of these remarks. After a general has called around him his chosen staff, he gives each of them his work to perform; this unquestionably was an after development in the history of the church, and it was for expediency these several offices were filled. Christ the foundation, his followers the superstructure. I read in Acts xvi. 23, the first mention of elders, and they were ordained in every church; and this was the act of Paul and Barnabas, this was out until about thirteen years after Christ's ascension, and this same duty Paul imposed on Titus some sixteen years after this. And some twenty-seven years after Christ's ascension, I read Paul to the church in Cenchrea speaking of the "Church in the house of Priscilla and Aequila," Rom. xvi. 3-5. As I have before said, the proof is wanting of what is known as "The established Church," whether of Rome, England or America. All the true followers or believers in Jesus Christ are as much saints as was Paul, or Peter, or Timothy, or Titus, and they who make a distinction fail to discover the difference, for none exists!

From the foregoing I deduce the following, as I gather it from the writings of the authors of the books of what we style the N. T. First then, there was a church, I have defined what that is. The duties devolving upon the church, so far as the head of it declared, were at the same time very limited as they were also comprehensive. The duties of the brotherhood are stated in Matt. xviii. 15-17, and again verses 21, 22. Paul in his writings gave certain directions to some of the churches which he did not give to others, thus to my mind proving the expediency of some things, and the circumstances justified the action. I deduce from this, that the circumstances of the case are the only justifiable reasons which may lead the church of today to do that which might not have been consistent in former times, as to its forms and ceremonies, claiming, as I do, that no act shall at all militate against general principles acted upon in Apostolic times.

I further argue, that in matters of faith, the whole round of Christian confession is simplified and brought within the compass of the life of the Bible comprehending all the books from Genesis to the Apocalypse, and if any speak not according to this he is blind, and whatever his professions may be, they go far enough. My belief is that all Christians are not alike informed, and God knows why! My belief is that those who are taught of God by his word are the exponents of the same, and this I believe for the reasons above stated. A novice is certainly not competent to teach, therefore a proper respect is due to those who teach, as shown in Rom. xii.

As for what is termed a "confession of faith" I have very little, if any respect for such, believing, that from bedsteads are things Christians cannot grow upon, and we are admonished to grow, not only in God's favor but also his knowledge. I therefore can only ask of one who shows his willingness to serve the Lord Christ. Do you love him? If he says he does, I would ask him will you show your love by doing his commandments; if he says he will, I am justified in further saying, arise and be baptised calling on the name of the Lord, and then as the way opens to you, follow on in all the declared ordinances of Christ's house of which you now constitute a part, strive to sustain the privileged relation of one of the brethren of Christ, by loving those who bear his name and image, and by no means stop short of the highest attainments it is your privilege to reach.

My beloved sister, Harriet, sleeps in Jesus. She died Oct. 23, 1887, of tumor of the liver, aged 61 years. How many precious hours have we spent with her and her venerable husband, both at their house and at our own—but never again shall we meet her until the resurrection morning. The Lord hasten it in its time I pray. Her precious remains were carried to the Baptist Church and there a full house assembled to show their sympathy with the deceased and with the mourning husband and son. Precious words were spoken of her both in the life she lived, and in the death she died, and in her prospect of a glorious resurrection when the Lord shall come. We laid her away in Mt. Hope Cemetery until that day.

Her maiden name was Sarah Thorp. Was born in Staffordshire, England, Sept. 18, 1806. They emigrated to America in 1835, and have lived in Hammonton, N. J., for the last twenty-five years. By their godly lives in those years, and their humble deeds of love they so won the hearts of the people of H. that there was nothing in their power to do for them left undone, not only in her last illness but in bygone years. How tenderly she loved them and how sincerely she prayed for them. May we all meet her at the right hand of the Judge and hear the King say "Come." In this hope I am a mourning friend.

A BRIEF CRITICISM.

Attention is directed to Matt. xx. 23, "But to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father." Compare Mark x. 40. The Revision reads: "But to sit on my right hand, and on my left hand, is not mine to give, but it is for them for whom it has been prepared of my Father. These renderings, as they stand, certainly imply, very strongly, a limitation in the authority of Jesus as the Christ. They imply that the future positions of glory in the kingdom are not the Christ's to bestow, which is antagonistic to the analogy of Scripture on this point. If we turn to such passages as John v. 22, 23, 27; iii. 35; Acts xvii. 31; Rev. xxii. 12, etc., it will be found that complete judgment and power of rewarding are fully ascribed to Jesus at his second coming. The lodgment of all authority and power in him is sustained by the tenor of the Old and New Testaments. Hence there is nothing faulty in these renderings, which are open to suspicion in view of the number of italicised words introduced. Now able critics, in accord both with the Greek idiom and with the uniform Scriptural teaching, give renderings that remove this antagonism and preserves unity of doctrine. Thus, for example, Dr Wordsworth, Judge Jones, and others, translate: "Is not mine to give save to them," etc. That is, Jesus bestows the stations according to character, and the divine purpose of the Father. So Prof. Bush: "Is not mine to give, except to those," etc. So also Barnes and others. Such a rendering is required, and is in accord with the usage of language. It removes the necessity of employing italics to make out a meaning. It indicates the greatness and majesty of the Coming One. To enforce the correctness of this criticism, it is only requisite to read in the preceding chapter (v. 28) how this same Jesus, knowing and doing the will of the Father, assumes the authority of virtually bestowing in anticipation such positions of honor and glory upon the twelve. This promise of sitting upon thrones and judging, is a specific bestowal upon individuals of distinguishing privileges, and can only be attributed to the authority lodged in him which he ever retains.—O. N. H. Peters, A. M., in Messiah's Herald.

Miscellaneous.

The death has just occurred at Constantinople of Demetrius Antippa, who was educated in Paris during the Revolution. He was personally acquainted with Robespierre, Marat and Danton. He was intimate with Camille Desmoulins, and in Mme. Tallien's saloon danced and sung "Ca ira." He was a witness of the murder of Marie Antoinette.

THE WORLD'S LETTERS.

The number of letters exchanged annually is 5849 millions, of postal cards 1077 millions, of printed matter 4610 millions, and of patterns 104 millions. This gives an average of about five letters and postcards per annum for each inhabitant of the globe, the continent on which the proportion is highest being Australia, where it reaches 24 letters, etc., per head, as against 14 per head in Europe, and less than one-half per head in Asia.

THE NUTMEG.

The nutmeg tree flourishes near the equator. It is raised from the nut in nurseries, where it remains until the fifth year, when it puts forth its first blossoms. It is then set out permanently. The trees are planted thirty feet apart, in diamond order; they begin to bear in the eighth year, increasing for many years, and they pay a large profit. There is no nutmeg season. Every day in the year shows buds, blossoms and fruit, in every stage of growth to maturity. The nutmeg is a large and beautiful tree, with thick foliage, and of a rich green color. The ripe fruit is singularly brilliant. The shell is glossy black, and the mace it exposes when it bursts is bright scarlet, making it one of the most beautiful of the vegetable kingdom.

ANTS AT WORK.

A traveller in Central America witnessed the following:

The ants, which were of a very minute size, carried a dead, full-grown scorpion upon the wall of our room from the floor to the ceiling, and thence along the under surface of a beam, to a considerable distance, where at last they brought it safely into their nest in the interior of the wood.

During the latter part of this achievement they had to bear the whole weight of the scorpion, together with their own in their inverted position, and in this way to move along the beam. The order was so perfect that we could not detect the slightest deviation from an absolute symmetry, either in the arrangement of the little army of workmen or in their movements.

No corps of engineers could be drilled to a more absolute perfection in the performance of a mechanical task. According to a rough calculation there must have been five or six hundred of these intelligent little creatures at work.

Besides those engaged in the labor of transportation no others were seen. A single one was sitting on the sting at the end of the scorpion's tail, as if stationed there to overlook the whole proceeding; all the rest, without an exception, were at work.

A STRANGE OCCURRENCE.

A lady of New York moved last May a distance of perhaps a quarter of a mile. In the first house she left a young cat, but took with her another pet, a Skye terrier, which had been pussy's playmate. A year or so after, while cultivating some flowers in the yard, the dog annoyed her by persistently pulling her skirts and then running toward the back basement door. At last her attention was fully secured, and she resolved to see what the brute meant by his unusual conduct. He ran ahead of his mistress, barking at a great rate and manifesting his delight and satisfaction by peculiar capers. When the lady reached the front room she found the dog on the window sill whining at a strange cat, and upon nearer approach discovered it was the tabby that she had deserted just a year ago! Upon opening the window the cat, now full grown, bounded in and began to purr at the feet of the mistress. The dog's delight knew no limit, and the three together improvised quite a love feast. The questions naturally arise: How did the animal discover the new home and how long had she been in search of it? How was it that she remembered the dog and the dog remembered the cat?

NOT FAR.

Not far, not far from the kingdom,
Yet, in the shadow of sin,
How many are coming and going,
How few are entering in!

Not far from the golden gateway,
Where voices whisper and wait,
Yearning to enter in boldly,
So lingering still at the gate;

Catching the strain of the music
Floating so sweetly along,
Knowing the song they are singing,
Yet joining not in the song;

Seeing the warmth and the beauty,
The unbidden love and the light,
Yet weary, and lonely, and waiting,
Out in the desolate night!

Out in the dark and the danger,
Out in the night and the cold,
Though he is longing to lead them
Tenderly into the fold.

Not far, not far from the kingdom,
'Tis only a little space;
But it may be the last and forever,
Out of the resting place.

THE SEVENTH-DAY. No. 11.

(Copyrighted. 1887.)

THE JEWISH SABBATH ABOLISHED.

That circumcision, sacrifices, the Levitical priesthood, distinction of meats clean and unclean, the feast days, new moons, Sabbatical year, and the Jewish Sabbath, were all set aside by the gospel is as plainly taught as any gospel truth. 1. Circumcision. "If ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing." Gal. v. 2. 2. Sacrifices. "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not." See all of Heb. x. 1–10. 3. Priesthood. "The priesthood being changed," Heb. vii. 12. 4. Sabbatical years. "Ye observe days and months and times and years. I am afraid of you," Gal. iv. 10, 11. 5. Meats, feast days, new moons and Sabbath days. "Let no man, therefore, judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day (feast day—R. V.), or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days, which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ," Col. ii. 17, 18.

No one questions at all with regard to any of these terms except "the Sabbath days." But this is just as plain as any of them, except to those who dare not admit its most manifest meaning lest it overthrow their theory. That this does refer to the Jewish weekly Sabbath is manifest from many facts. In the Old Testament the Sabbath is repeatedly classed with the very list here given of meats, drinks, feast days and new moons. Thus: "Concerning the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts" verse 2. "Six days shall work be done; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of rest" (verse 3). "In the fourteenth day of the first month at even is the Lord's passover" (verse 5). "And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread" (verse 6). "In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, shall ye have a Sabbath" (verse 24). "Also on the tenth day of the seventh month there shall be a day of atonement" (verse 27). "Also in the fifteenth day of the seventh month" (verse 39). "These are the feasts of the Lord" (verse 37). Here we have the Sabbath directly associated with meats, drinks, and all the Jewish feasts, just as Paul puts it in Col. ii. 16.

So Num. xxviii. 9–31: "And on the Sabbath day two lambs." "And in the beginning of your months (new moons) ye shall offer a burnt offering." "And in the fourteenth day of the first month is the passover." "His meat offering . . . . and their drink offerings." In no less than twelve different places in the Sabbath classed right in with these new moons and feast days. Yet I, like all my seventh day brethren, firmly believed and have said a thousand times, that the seventh day Sabbath was never associated with new moons and feast days. It is now unaccountable to me how I ever could have been so blind.

But it is argued that as "the Sabbath days" of Col. ii. 16 "are a shadow of things to come" (verse 17), and the weekly Sabbath is a memorial of creation, pointing back to the beginning, therefore they can not be the same, for the Sabbath could not point both ways. But is not this a mere assertion without any proof? How do we know that it cannot point both ways? The passover was a memorial of their deliverance from Egypt, and always pointed back to that event, Ex. xii. 11–17. Yet it was also a shadow of Christ, Col. ii. 16, 17. "Even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us," 1 Cor. v. 7. So all those annual feasts were types of Christ in some way, and yet all were memorials also of past events, as all know. Elder J. N. Andrews, in his "History of the Sabbath" (chap. 7), admits this. But who would ever have thought of this if the apostle had not told us?

If, then, these feast days could be both memorials and types, pointing both ways, so can the Sabbath. Paul says plainly that the Sabbath days are a shadow of things to come, and one plain statement of inspiration is worth a thousand of our vain reasonings. This is in harmony with Paul's argument in Heb. iv. 1–11, that the seventh day is a type. For fifty years we have tried to explain away this text, and to show that it really can not mean what it says; but there it stands, and mocks all other theories. The Sabbath is a type, for inspiration says so.

But that upon which they rely the most of all to save this text from applying to the Sabbath, is the confident assertion that there were several yearly or annual Sabbath days, and that Paul's language must apply to these instead of the weekly Sabbaths. It is true that in our English version the word Sabbath is applied to four of these feast days. Thus, "In the seventh month, shall ye have a Sabbath," Lev. xxiii. 24. "Also on the tenth day . . . . shall be unto you a Sabbath" Lev. xxiii. 24. "Also on the tenth day . . . . shall be unto you a Sabbath." (verses 27–32). Also of the feast on the fifteenth to the twenty-second of the month, "the first day shall be a Sabbath, and on the eighth day shall be a Sabbath" (verse 39). Here it is claimed are at least four annual Sabbaths, and to these are referred "the Sabbath days" of Col. ii.

But we turn to the Greek, in which Paul wrote, and find that the word for "Sabbath days" is sabbaton, exactly the word and the only word that is ever used for the seventh day Sabbath. Is that the term used where the word Sabbath is applied to the annual feast days? No, indeed, except in just barely one instance. The day of atonement, the tenth day of the seventh month, is called a Sabbath (sabbaton) in the Greek, Lev. xxiii. 32. The Hebrew word for Sabbath is shabbath. In only this one instance is it ever applied to any of the annual festivals. The word "Sabbath" in the English version, when applied to these annual feasts, is from the Greek term anapausis, and in the Hebrew from shabbathon. These words should not be translated "Sabbath," but should be rendered "rest," as they are in the Revised Version. Thus all these texts read in the new version: "In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, there shall be a solemn rest unto you," Lev. xxiii. 24. "On the first day shall be a solemn rest, and on the eighth day shall be a solemn rest" (verse 39). So also in the English version of the Hebrew used by the Jews these words are translated rest, not Sabbath. Thus: "In the seventh month, on the first day of the month, shall ye have a rest," not Sabbath (verse 24). "On the first day shall be a rest, and on the eighth day shall be a rest" (verse 39).

Hence, except the weekly Sabbath, among all the feast days and holy days of the Old Testament, only one single day in the whole year is ever called a Sabbath. So it is not correct to speak of "the annual Sabbaths," much less to say that there were seven of them. There was just one, and no more, and this one was included in the annual feast days. This even Elder Andrews confesses. He says, "The annual Sabbaths were part and parcel of these feasts" ("History of the Sabbath," p. 86). So, then, that one annual Sabbath was embraced in the term, feast days. Therefore, "the Sabbath days" of Col. ii. 16, can not possibly be applied to the annual holy-days, for sabbaton, the word there used, is not the word used for these days. Feast days (heortes) is the term embracing all those days, as we have seen. Hence, "the Sabbath days" (sabbaton) must apply only to the weekly Sabbaths. Or to say the least, this term being pre-eminently, almost exclusively, applied to the weekly Sabbaths, must include them any way, whether it did say others or not.

And if Paul had meant to name the weekly Sabbath days, he could have used no other term for them than the one he did use, sabbaton. Let Sabbatarians weigh this well. Now read together a few of many texts where we certainly know that the weekly Sabbaths are meant. It will be noticed that the plural number is used, the same as in Col. ii. 16. "Verily my Sabbaths (plural) ye shall keep, for it (singular) is a sign," Ex. xxxi. 13. We know this is the weekly Sabbath. "Keep my Sabbaths," Lev. xix. 3. "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths," Lev. xix. 30. "Besides the Sabbaths of the Lord," Lev. xxiii. 38. All claim this to be the weekly Sabbath. "Keep my Sabbaths," Isa. lvi. 4. "I give them my Sabbaths to be a sign." "My Sabbaths they greatly polluted." Ezek. xx. 12, 13. "On the Sabbath days the priests in the temple profane the Sabbath." "Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath days?" Matt. xii. 5, 10. Jesus "taught them on the Sabbath days." Luke iv. 31. "Is it lawful on the Sabbath days?" Luke vi. 9. "Three Sabbath days reasoned," Acts xvii. 2. "Let no man therefore judge you . . . . in respect . . . . of the Sabbath days," Col. ii. 16.

Who can read this list of texts and not be profoundly impressed that by "the Sabbath days" of Col ii. 16, Paul means just what that language means in all the other cases? Of course he did, and no other reasonable application can be made of it. Add to this the fact that in the Greek the same term is used in all these cases, and the conclusion is inevitable. Not only the same word, but precisely the same form of the word that is used in Col. ii. 16, is time and again used for the weekly Sabbath. Thus, Matt. xxviii. 1, "In the end of the Sabbath;" Luke iv. 16, "on the Sabbath days." Exactly the same original word, letter for letter, in all these texts, as every one who can read a word of Greek knows. All the others mean the weekly Sabbaths. Then why not this also?

Once more. The word Sabbath occurs sixty times in the New Testament. In fifty-nine of these sixty times it is freely admitted by all the seventh-day people that it means the weekly Sabbath; but in the sixtieth case, where exactly the same word is used, both in Greek and English, they stoutly contend that it must mean something else! Does not this look a little suspicious? But, as we have seen, there are no other Sabbath days to which it could apply.

Further, Paul simply and squarely said "the Sabbath days," without making any exception, hence the weekly Sabbaths must have been included at least. It is certain that no Sabbatarian would ever have written as Paul did here. I have often wished that this text was not in the Bible, and it troubles my seventh-day Adventist brethren as much as it did me, say me, say what they will.

But what settles it beyond a reasonable doubt that Col. ii. 16 does refer to the weekly Sabbaths is the fact that exactly the same list of holy days here given by Paul is given about a dozen times in the Old Testament, where we know it means the seventh day.

Let us look at the law concerning these holy days. In Numbers xxviii. and xxix. you have a detailed law as to just what offerings shall be made on each day of the whole year. The first were the daily offerings of "two lambs," day by day, for a continual burnt offering. "The one lamb shalt thou offer in the morning, and the other lamb shalt thou offer at the even." vs 3, 4. The second were the offerings on the Sabbath. "And on the Sabbath day two lambs of the first year without spot." vs. 9, 10. None will deny that this was the weekly Sabbath. Third, in the very next verse come the new moons. And in the beginnings of your months ye shall offer a burnt offering unto the Lord." vs. 11–15. Fourth, comes the annual feast days. "And in the fourteenth day of the first month is the passover of the Lord." vs. 16. Then follows a complete list of all the annual feast days, including the day of atonement, and closing with these words, "These things shall ye do unto the Lord in your set feasts." Num. xxix. 39.

Here we have the law for the daily, weekly, monthly and yearly offerings; or, those on each day, on the weekly Sabbaths, on the new moons, and on the set or appointed yearly feast days. Now read the following texts, and notice how this list of daily offerings, offerings on the Sabbaths, on the new moons and on the set feasts, as were laid down in the law of Moses, is repeatedly referred to in almost exactly the words of Col. ii. 16.

1 Chron. xxiii. 30, 31: "And to stand every morning to thank and praise the Lord, and likewise at even; and to offer all burnt sacrifices unto the Lord in the Sabbaths, in the new moons, and on the set feasts, by number, according to the order commanded unto them." Here is a direct reference to the daily offerings, offerings on the weekly Sabbaths, new moons and set feasts, just as ordered in Num. xxviii. and xxix. Can any one doubt that "the Sabbaths" here are the weekly Sabbaths, the same as there? Certainly not.

2 Chron. ii. 4: "For the burnt offerings morning and evening (daily), on the Sabbaths (weekly), and on the new moons (monthly), and on the solemn feasts (yearly) of the Lord." Precisely the same list again, and in the same order, hence the weekly Sabbaths are the ones named. Besides, it would be absurd to suppose that Solomon would name all the other and minor holy days, but say nothing about the chiefest of all days, the weekly Sabbaths, and so they are in all the passages which follow.

2 Chron. viii. 13: "Even after a certain rate every day (daily again), offering according to the commandment of Moses, on the Sabbaths (weekly), and on the new moons (monthly), and on the solemn feasts (yearly), three times in the year." Same list and order as before.

2 Chron. xxxi. 3: "The morning and evening burnt offerings, and the burnt offerings for the Sabbaths, and for the new moons, and for the set feasts, as it is written in the law of the Lord." The same list again, daily, weekly, monthly and yearly offerings, just in the order they would naturally come, and just as given "in the law of the Lord." Num. xxviii. and xxix. But if these Sabbaths are not the weekly Sabbaths, then the Lord names the daily, monthly and yearly offerings, but skips the weekly offerings. Every thinking man knows that such an interpretation is false. But it is the only way the Sabbath can be saved from Paul's list, Col. ii. 16, for that is the same as all these.

Neh. x. 33: "For the shew bread, and for the continual meat offering, and for the continual burnt offering, of the Sabbaths, of the new moons, for the set feasts." Same list again, daily, weekly, monthly and yearly. Either the weekly Sabbaths are meant here, or else reference to the worship of God on the Sabbath is always studiously avoided, while all the rest is carefully mentioned. The evidence is too plain to mistake which it is.

Hosea ii. 11: "I will also cause all her mirth to cease, her feast days, her new moons, and her Sabbaths, and all her solemn feasts."

Col. ii. 16: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a feast day (R. V.), or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days." Here, as before, are the yearly, monthly and weekly holy days just as laid down in the law, Num. xxviii., xxix., where we know the weekly Sabbaths are meant. It is evident that Paul had in his mind those lists of holy days so often given in the Old Testament, where the Sabbath is included.

But on Hosea ii. 11 an effort is made by Sabbath keepers to distinguish these Sabbaths from the weekly Sabbaths because they are called "her Sabbaths." But the assertion is unsupported by any proof. Why were the yearly holy days her days? Did the Jews appoint them? No; the Lord appointed them just as he did the Sabbath, and gave them to Israel to keep. Hence, from one point of view they are her days. God's, because he commanded them; hers, because given to them. "I gave them my Sabbaths." Ezek. xx. 12. So we read of nearly every sacred institution of the Bible. In one place it is "the Lord's," and in the next it is "hers," "yours" or theirs," but the same institution all the time. Thus we read of the temple: "Mine house," Isa. lvi. 7; "your house," Matt. xxiii. 38. Of the sacrifices: "The sacrifices of the Lord," Lev. x. 13, and "your sacrifices," Deut. xii. 6. Of the law: "My law," Jer. vi. 19; "your law," John x. 34. Now notice particularly that the feast days are spoken of in exactly the same manner that the Sabbath is; that is, "my feasts" and "her feasts," "my Sabbaths" and "her Sabbaths." Thus: "The feasts of the Lord," Lev. xxiii. 4; "the Sabbaths of the Lord," vs. 38; "my feasts," vs 2; "my Sabbaths," Ex. xxxi. 13; "a feast unto the Lord," Lev. xxxiii. 41; "the holy Sabbath unto the Lord," Ex. xvi. 23; "her feast days, her new moons, and her Sabbaths," Hosea ii. 11. These quotations are sufficient to show the fallacy of trying to make a distinction between "my Sabbaths," and "her Sabbaths." The same argument would prove that "my feasts" and her feasts," "my sacrifices" and "your sacrifices," "my house" and "your house," etc., were entirely different. But everybody knows better. These expressions apply to the same thing from different standpoints; the Sabbaths of the Lord as appointed by him; her Sabbaths as kept by them; and this is the whole of it.

In the above from Hosea ii. 11, is a plain prophecy that all these holy days should cease, just as we know has happened in fact; and in Col. ii. 16, is proof that they were nailed to the cross.

But it is said that this view of Paul's language abolishes all holy days and leaves the church without any rest day. The answer is easy and manifest. Paul was treating of the old institutions of the Jewish age, which has been nailed to the cross, Col. ii. 14. Hence his language has no reference to the new institutions of the gospel, of which there might have been a dozen holy days, so far as these texts are concerned.

After the most careful investigation on both sides, I solemnly believe, in the fear of God, that the above position on Col. ii. 16 is correct. I have not one doubt about it.

Lesson 12.

HOPE.

(Desire, expectation, confidence.)

Leading thoughts: A heavenly country, and a never-ending life.

Golden Texts: "Christ in you the hope of glory." Col. i. 27. "Be always ready to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope, etc." 1 Peter iii. 15.

Lesson Chapter: Heb. vi. 10 to close.

Question. What does the apostle speak of in verses 18 and 19?

Answer. The hope of the promises made unto Abraham. Gen. 12, 1–3; 13, 14–18; 17, 7, 8; 22, 17, 18; Psa. 105, 9–11; Luke 1, 72, 73, 77.

Q. When Abraham was called to go out into a strange land, how did he go out? and how did he dwell in it?

A. By faith; "expecting that city having the foundations, of which God is the designer and architect;" "sojourning in the land as in a strange country." Heb. xi. 10, 9.

Q. How did he regard the country?

A. As "a place which he should after receive as an inheritance." Heb. 11, 8.

Q. What is this country called?

A. "The Land of Promise." Heb. 11, 9.

Q. Has it any other name?

A. The heavenly country. Heb. 11, 16.

Q. If Canaan, in Palestine, is "the land of promise," "the heavenly country," which Abraham in the hereafter is to receive for an everlasting possession, and if he has been made "the heir of the world" will not the same glorious inheritance, be our future abode?

A. "God gave the inheritance to Abraham by promise," and he says, "If ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to promise." Gal. 3, 18, 29; Rom. 4, 13, 16. Note, "the promise is sure to all his seed."

Q. Is this promise for all who are called and whose sins have been purged?

A. Yes; Heb. 9, 15.

Q. What was Paul's hope and how did he manifest it?

A. The hope of the promise made unto the fathers, manifested by his willingness to be judged. Acts 26, 6–8; 23, 6; 24, 14, 15, 21, 24; 28, 20.

Q. Was there in the promise made to Abraham of an everlasting inheritance in the land of Canaan, the promise of an everlasting life?

A. Yes. "I will be your God" was equivalent to saying, "I will raise you from the dead and give you eternal life." See the argument of Jesus in Matt. 22, 31, 32; Mark 12, 26; Luke 20, 35, 36, 37.

Q. Is not then "the hope of the gospel" the hope of eternal life and of eternal inheritance through a resurrection of the dead?

A. It is; judging from the expressed hope of Paul, and from the language of Jesus. See also Matt. 5, 5; Psa. 37, 9, 11, 18, 29; Titus 1, 2; 3, 7; 1 Pet. 1, 3, 4; Rom. 6, 5, 22, 23. Paul was made a minister of "the hope of the gospel," and his hope was "the hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers." Col. 1, 23; Acts 26, 6.

Q. Is there more than one hope revealed in the Bible?

A. Eph. 4, 4.

Q. What does hope do for us?

A. It saves us. Rom. 8, 24, 25.

Q. With what should the Christian be armed?

A. 1 Thess. 5, 8, 9.

Q. In whom should we have hope?

A. In the Lord. Psa. 146, 5; 33, 7; 71, 5; Rom. 5, 1, 2; Gal. 5, 5.

Q. What hope is an incentive to a purification of life?

A. The hope of being made like Jesus when he shall appear. 1 John 3, 1–3; Titus 2, 11–14.

Q. Will the Canaan, the world, promised to Abraham, and which the righteous are to inherit, remain as now when Christ comes?

A. 2 Peter 3, 13, 14; Rev. 21, 1–5, 7; 22, 3.

"Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father, which hath loved us, and hath given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace, comfort your hearts, and stablish you in every good word and work." 2 Thess. 2, 16, 17.

Songs in Earnest.

This is a little volume of poems from the graceful pen of Mrs. M. J. A. Crozier. To the readers of THE RESTITUTION, who have been often treated to gems from her hand, it is needless to say that they are indeed songs in earnest. The deep, strong womanly feeling pervading every thing that comes from her pen is born of Christian love and Christian hope and Christian patience.

"Words for today," the second poem in this little volume is a powerful appeal in behalf of temperance, for instance:

O the night is dark and fearful,
And the colors of God are fearful,
'Tis the wrong that wears the purple,
And the poor are trodden down;
But the throne of earth shall crumble,
Christ uplifts the poor and humble,
For the mire is rich with jewels
That shall shine in Jesus' crown.

Let who fears his God and neighbor,
Faithful watch and faithful labor,
Lighting with his candle gleaming,
Each a brother's doubtful way;
Till the word of God be spoken,
Let the night of death be broken,
And the eastern heavens are lighted
By the golden feet of day.

Another gem is "My Cabin House," teaching the sweet lesson that love can make home a paradise even in the lonely cot of the wild frontier. Marble halls are not necessary for happiness, but true love and confidence and trust in the All Father will crown with sweet content and happiness the lowliest homes on earth.

Life, and Faith, and Olivet, are sweet, true poems, and also "Only a Little While."

"Only a little while,
Of walking with weary feet,
Patiently over the thorny way
That leads to the golden street."

Bound in cloth, they are 50 cents each, in paper 30 cents; send orders to Mrs. M. P. A. Crozier, Ann Arbor, Mich. Christmas is coming; send a dollar and get two bound copies for Christmas presents. Yours in hope,

MRS. H. V. REED.

HIS CARE.

God holds the key of all unknown,
And I am glad;
If other hands should hold the key,
Or if he trusted it to me,
I might be sad.

What if tomorrow's care were here
Without its rest?
I had rather he unlock the day,
And as the hours swing open say,
"My will is best."

The very calmness of my sight
Makes me secure,
For, groping in my misty way,
I feel his hand—I hear him say,
"My help is sure."

I cannot read his future plan,
But this I know,
I have the smiling of his face,
And all the refuge of his grace,
While here below.

Enough; this covers all my want,
And so I rest;
For what I cannot do can one,
And in his care I sure shall be Forever blest.

—John Parker.

GOD REACHES DOWN TO US.

The one great fact which needs perpetual witness in our life is this: that God dwells in nature, and God dwells in man; that his hand is reached out from the infinite to lay hold of the hand of every one that seeks him; that the ladder up which the angel prayers do run is let down from heaven to men, not built up from earth heavenward; that there is no way by which we can climb laboriously up to God, but that God, the Father, is forever stooping down, and lifting up his children in his arms, that he may give them the kiss of welcome, and pour into their bosoms the breath of his own life; that today, as in the Garden of Eden, he still takes our frozen and cold frames, and breathes into us the breath of life, if we will but let him. And the Church of God is the Church of God only as we make it a monument to this, existing, ever-present, ever life-giving God, and as we make it a meeting place between ourselves and him, a witness to all that he has done in the past, a witness to all the wonders that he has wrought in the past; a witness to the mercy and grace that led the children of Israel out of Egypt and through the Red Sea; to the mercy and the grace that attended them in all their history; to the mercy and the grace that manifested itself in the living and in the dying Savior of mankind, and touched with a coal of fire the lips of the Apostle to the Gentiles—a witness to all this, but a witness to much more than this; a witness to the God that dwells in the hearts of his people here, a witness that speaks to every man that it is God dwelling in him; that touches with a coal of fire every lip that is consecrated to speak or to sing his praise.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE LIFE OF THE CHRISTIAN.

Some Indian shawls are made of hundreds of pieces, some so small as to be only an eighth of an inch square, others of various sizes, none larger than a square half-yard. Each piece, even the smallest, forms a complete bit of the pattern, and the right side, being the under one in the frame on which it is woven, is not seen by the weaver until the piece is finished. The pieces are all so beautifully joined together that it is impossible to find the joining.

How often we "are discouraged because of the way;" because we can only see the wrong side of the pattern our daily life is weaving. We forget that "the Lord knoweth them that are his," and that "all things work together for good to them that love God." And should we not try to remember also, that, though our place in the work may be a very small one, the great fabric, the Church of God, would be incomplete if that place were not filled?

There is another point of similarity; each thread is bleached perfectly white before being re-dyed for the shawl; so we also, before becoming a part of the Church, must be washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb, "that he might present it to himself, a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing;" but that it should be holy and without blemish.

"I know the hand that is guiding me
Through the shadow to the light,
And I know that all building me.
Is meted out aright.
I know that the thorny path I tread
Is ruled by a golden line;
And I know that the darkest life's tangled thread,
Has richer the deep design."

This may be for the encouragement of some tried child of God, who, perhaps, feels as though the way by which the Lord is leading is dark and incomprehensible to human eyes.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL-MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "6" and reads "Jny6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

JEWISH SABBATH ABOLISHED.

THE COMMANDMENTS OF GOD: WHAT ARE THEY?

The above is the title of a 16 page tract written by Elder D. M. Canright. It gives his reasons for giving up the Seventh-day Sabbath after keeping it for 25 years, and is a most excellent tract for our friends to circulate in neighborhoods where there are Sabbath keepers. ## CRUDEN'S CONCORDANCE.

UNABRIDGED.

This work is too well known to need comment—every Bible student knows the value of Alexander Cruden's Concordance; bound cloth, price $1.50.

[illegible] are brought [illegible]
Others are hallowed by day pain and tears,
But all are benedictions from above.

In thoughtful joy we take the gifts of God
As though by virtue of ourselves they came,
And when he touches with his chastening rod,
His blessings we forget and him we blame.

I met a little child upon whose face
Was written innocence and health and glee.
No blush of shame had ever marred its grace
Or tainted its sweet childish purity.

I stopped and asked her what she knew of life,
Amid its cares and sorrows, hopes and fears:
Whether she ever heard of toil and strife:
Whether her joys were ever mixed with tears.

The child replied, her face serene and bright,
"This world is very happy. All day long
I play among the flowers, and at night
The birds lull me to sleep with evening song."

"But," said I, not satisfied in mind,
"Suppose the birds are flown, the flowers all dead;
Suppose the sun is hid and winds unkind
Fright snow-flakes where your little feet now tread."

"Ah, then I hide my face in mother's breast.
And, while she tells me of the winter storm,
I grieve and happiness content I rest:
For well I know the spring will soon be here.

"And then how happy I shall be once more,
For God will send the birds and flowers again.
My joy will be far greater than before,
Because my loss has taught me of my gain."

Dear fellow pilgrim, what has life for thee?
Has God sent blessing not unmixed with grief?
Have burning tears chilled up the morning dew?
Has bitter anguish tempted unbelief?

Doubt not that he who said, "Come unto me,"
Can turn to blessing every sigh and tear,
Believe, rejoice, and every grief shall flee:
Love, confidence, and hope will banish fear.

If we but rightly know our several parts,
Life is a melody of sweetest strains;
God plays with marvelous skill upon our hearts,
And makes a harmony of joy and pain.

The Covenant Between God and Man, Called the Bible Covenant, Not a Testament or Testamentary Will of a Dead God, or Any Other Person.

As theology has made out and the whole Christian hierarchy has come to tacitly accept and seem to believe, I say seem, because to ordinary intelligence, starting with the first postulate that there is a God who is the First Cause and author of all things, to somehow conclude that, although "ever-living" and "all-controlling" he finally became involved in the catastrophe of his creation and creatures to the extent of suffering death, a death too that he himself had decreed to be the penalty of the violation of his own law; with this first premise given, such a conclusion I say, is absurd on the face of it. Stripped of its fine-spun sophistry and delusive verbiage this is the kind of reasoning that has finally crystallized in the following terms now almost universally used to designate the collection of books known as the Bible, "The Old and New Testament" namely.

What is a testament and what is testamentary evidence? Reader, if you do not know already, ask the first lawyer you meet. They are legal terms and he ought to know. He will tell you a testament is a "will," and "that it is not valid during the life of the testator." For while the testator is alive he may change it or make an entirely new one of later date. It must therefore be "his last will or testament," and after his death this fact must be proved to insure its validity.

Now no one will deny that the Scriptures known as "The Bible" purport to be a revelation of man of God's will or purpose in creation and redemption. Does not the term "testament," "the Old and New Testament" constantly imply and convey to the mind of the hearer and reader that its author has died? Has "the ever-living God, who alone hath immortality" died? For if you believe its teachings, the simplest and plainest of them all is that this God is the author of them and that their human authorship is merely putative. (The prophet was but "a mouth-piece" of the Lord.) Then the conclusion is unavoidable if the term "testament" applied to these Scriptures be a correct term, that this God their author has died. To convince you, my reader, that I am not exaggerating the folly of theological reasoning and perversion of the truth, let me quote for you a passage from Hebrews ix. 14-18 of "The New Covenant Scriptures" according to the "Revision." Read it also in the Com. Ver. The variations are suggestive and instructive.

14. How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal spirit offered himself without blemish unto God, cleanse your conscience from dead works to serve the living God.

15. And for this cause he is the mediator of a new COVENANT that a death having taken place for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant, they that have been called may receive the promise of the eternal inheritance.

16. For where there is a covenant it is necessary that the death of the one covenanted (i. e., the victim, not the one who makes it,) be brought about.

17. For a covenant over dead ones (i. e., victims) is valid, since, while the one covenanted liveth, it is not strong (in the sense of validity, of course).

18. Whence not even was the first (covenant) renewed without blood." (Hence here refers to the yearly "renewing service" in the temple, a part of the regular Levitical service—a formal renewing of the original covenant made by Moses as a "mediator" between God and his people.)

This was the particular Levitical ceremony referred to by John x. 22 of his gospel, and it reads in this wise:

22. And the "renewing service" had occurred in Jerusalem. It was winter.

23. And Jesus was walking in Solomon's porch.

Now those who think of God's Covenant as a "testament," if they do any thinking that is worthy of the term think, cannot help reaching just such a conclusion as this passage given above from the Revised Version very plainly teaches and indicates, namely, that the maker of this "testament," "the ever-living God," has died. For that he is the maker of this covenant which they have made to read "testament;" See the 8th chap. 7th verse and seq.

7. For if this first (covenant) had been faultless, a place would not have been sought for a second.

8. For finding fault (with it) he saith unto them, Lo days are coming, saith the Lord, and I am going to consummate in unity (make) over the house of Israel and over the house of Joudah, a new covenant, etc."

Here we have the prophecy uttered hundreds of years before that God was going to "make" a new covenant and in the passage first quoted we have the statement that this prophecy had been fulfilled, and that as Moses was the mediator of the first or Old, so the Christ was or is the mediator of the second or New.

All the argument of salvation and redemption hangs upon this covenant between the ever-living God as "the party of the first part" and mankind as "the party of the second part" with Jesus the Christ as the mediator of it.

What right has any translator to mistranslate in such a way as to interpolate a conclusion in regard to a covenant that can be drawn only from an argument in regard to a "testament" which anybody who has ordinary common sense and intelligence knows is an entirely different instrument or instrumentality? I am a Protestant and I protest against any such tampering with reason as well as revelation. In the ordinary affairs of life we do not use language in any such loose way. Shall we be less careful in spiritual and eternal things?

OUR GYPSIES.

Never a people on earth had so strange a story to tell as the race of gypsies which is fast passing away from England. Little they know concerning themselves; little we know concerning them; yet they have been prominent in our literature and in our legal statutes for centuries. English children were once terrified into momentary subjection by threats of coming gypsies, who would stick a plaster over their mouths and carry them away. Richard Brinsley Sheridan made, concerning the literary thieves of his day: "Steal to be sure they may, and good, some your best thoughts as gypsies do stolen children—disfigure them to make 'em pass for their own."

The poor Rommani have been accused of every crime under the sun, from witchcraft to cannibalism; they have been hunted over all the earth like wild beasts; suffered at the stake, by the rack, by fire and sword. The hand of every man has been against them; yet they still tarry with us. Never a race on earth had so strange a history; never a race on earth had so sad a story to tell. They have walked with us for long centuries, but we know them not; their dusky skins, dark eyes, and straight black hair are familiar to us all, yet we know not anything concerning them. We have crossed our palms with silver, and they have lifted the curtain which hides us from the morrow, yet we know not anything concerning them. They have a soft, sweet language of their own; they have rude ballads, and a quaint folklore, but they have no literature. They have no Rommany books, no Rommany writing, but the stories they tell and the ballads they croon have passed from parent to child for untold generations. The scholars say that our nation is an Indo-European nation; that our language came from India; that the civilization of our land was born on the banks of the Oxus, in the far East; our folklore, our Cinderella and the little glass slipper came from the East. The story of Gelert and his faithful hound came from India, so did the gypsies. Their soft Romanes language is an Indian language; their songs, their traditions are Indian; the root words of their daily lives came from far-off Sanskrit sources, and their fables were born under sunny skies in the distant East.

How came these dusky fortune-tellers to Europe? Not by the same route nor at the same time that we came, but by some more modern path. They cannot tell us, but the Romanes language will tell us. The Sanskrit of India has been mixed with the language of the lands through which they passed. They came, not by Arabian sands, for they have no Arabic words, but by the land of the Persian and the Greek; for their soft Rommany tongue is touched with Greek and Persian words. Their very name, the Rommani, is of Indian origin. The gypsy calls himself a Rom—a man—and the great god of India, Rama, is nearly related to them all. They came into Europe no man knows when or how; but the earliest trace of them is about the fourteenth or fifteenth century. They came in hordes, some led by rich "dukes," others by "kings." They came as pious pilgrims from Egypt, but it was soon discovered that they were thieves and robbers. The Magyars call them, even unto this day, Pharao nepek, or Pharaoh's people. The Dutch call them Heydens, or heathens; and the Turks call them Haramai—villains. We call them gypsies, from Egyptian; while the Scotch call them tinklers, from the trade of tinkers, which they often followed. In southern parts of Scotland they are known as muggers, from the fact that they carry mugs and pots for sale on their strong, well kept donkeys. That they came not from Egypt is certain, for there also they were strangers, and every man's hand was against them. In the land of the Pharaohs they were serpent charmers, in other lands they were fortune tellers, in every land they were counted as knaves.

During the Middle Ages they were said to be descendants of Simon Magus, the sorcerer, who would fain have purchased the Holy Ghost power with money; but whoever the poor Rom was said to be related to, he was accursed. They were driven from every country in turn; they were imprisoned, tortured, slain, and in some places exterminated. Sometimes they were welcomed as guests, as in Scotland, where, in 1530, they "Domith before the king in Halyrudhous." But within a century of that time four were hung in Edinburgh for "abyding within the kingdom, they being Egyptians." At Hadington, too, it was ordered against a party of unfortunate Rommani that "the men are to be hangit and the wemen to be drowned; and suche of the wemen as has children to be scourgit through the burgh and burnt in the cheeke." Even worse things were done in England to these wandering Ishmaelites, who were captured in gangs and shipped off to desolate places in Norway and Africa. Every man's hand was against them, and necessarily theirs were against every man. Better days came for the dusky children of the far land, and they have passed in and out amongst us for a long time, telling fortunes, stealing chickens, and mending pots and pans.

But the days of the wandering Rommany race in England are almost over. The broad lands are being enclosed; the merry greenwoods are "preserved;" the policeman is everywhere; and so the poor Rommani must change their habits or perish. Once upon a time they told the fortunes of ignorant people, and at times persuaded some credulous old dame to bury her treasure in a certain spot, and it would increase in a week, or before the new moon. When the dame sought her treasure it was gone—with the gypsy. Now even, the gypsy tells the fortunes of credulous folks at our fairs. But the gypsies in our land today are learning to earn a living in the ways of civilized people. Sometimes a gypsy grows rich and leaves his people, becoming a Rommany-rye, or a gypsy gentleman, but not often.

Many and tender are the bonds which bind this homeless, landless race to us today. They are a kindly people, who have been persecuted as no other race on earth ever was. They have no religion of their own, but seem to share more or less, in the creed of the nation with which they dwell. They used to bury their dead in the sweet, green spots near their camps, for a gypsy maiden said that they liked to think of their loved ones being camped near their grave, and so she would not be laid in a churchyard where her people would never come near. They are kind to one another; they are kind to their dumb beasts. They are the most inveterate beggars in the world. It sounds strange to English ears to listen to the voices of the dark-eyed children as they beg for coppers in the name of the Madonna. The women all beg most piteously, and the baby hands are stretched out appealingly for charity; but the men look lazy; they are all fond of finery, and they play at cards, and play a game very much like our English "duck-stone;" and, one way or another, they touch us that although vagrants on the earth, as all their fathers were, they are true to the habits of their people. They are very much what centuries of cruelty and oppression have made them. They are a mystic race, and are disappearing from our land along with the green fields and breezy moors which once were common to every man.—E. MacMillan, in the Index.

THE COMING AGE,
—IN—
Nature and Proximity,
—By J. P. WESTERN.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge [illegible] and immense wealth and commercial enterprises, the miracles of [illegible] inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concern ing the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It declares the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to secure preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great directing Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Ruler, and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $1.00. Send to this office for this work.

Dear Restitution:

It has been supposed by some, that through Solomon's disobedience and wickedness, the coming of the Messiah through him and his descendants was forfeited and changed to the Nathan line.

Others have supposed that Jesus being a descendant of the wicked king, Jehoiakim, "would have no claim to the throne of David."

Again another has said, "Dr. Thomas gives the whole question away in trying to make out that Jesus came of the stock of Jeconias."

Now all these various and conflicting ideas, and many other similar ones, which might be given, are the result of a lack of careful examination and thought.

It was Jehoiakim, the seventeenth king of Judah—there having been only nineteen in all, and all of course in the Solomon line, Zedekiah being the last—who was one of the wicked kings, and of whom it was said, "He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David." This was not said as some suppose, of Jechonias, called in other places Jehoiachim, 2 Kings xxiv. 6, and Coniah and who was the son of Jehoiakim. It was said of Jehoiakim because of his great wickedness, and his cutting out with his penknife the leaves of the roll book, containing the word of the Lord to him, and burning them. And also because the kingdom was soon to be discontinued.

"Thou shalt say to Jehoiakim, king of Judah thus saith the Lord; Thou hast burned this roll, saying (to Jeremiah), why hast thou written therein saying the king of Babylon shall certainly come and destroy this land, and shall cause to cease from thence man and beast? Therefore thus saith the Lord of Jehoiakim king of Judah; he shall have none to sit upon the throne of David: and his dead body shall be cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost. And I will punish him and his seed and his servants for their iniquity." Jer. xxxvi. 29–31. By this we see that both Jehoiakim and his son Jeconiah,—Coniah, were to be punished. But it was Jehoiakim who had done the terrible deed of despising and burning the words of the Lord, and who by his wickedness had corrupted not only his son but the kingdom and nation.

But what is meant by the words, He, Jehoiakim, shall have none to sit upon the throne of David? It could not have meant just as there worded without some kind of qualification; for Jehoiakim's son, Jechoniah (called also Coniah and Jehoiachim, did succeed his father, and sat upon the throne of David, occupying it as long or longer than one other king before him; though his reign was not a prosperous one. What then do those words mean? Why, the prophet evidently meant just the same as he did in chapter xxii. 18–30, where the same prophecy against Jehoiakim is also recorded, but expressed more at length and in a little different words. Both places taken together and in the light of the existing circumstances—the deplorably wicked rebellious state of the kingdom of Judah at the time—we have the real meaning, viz: that no son of his (Jehoiakim's) should sit and "prosper" upon the throne of David. Commencing at the 18th verse of said chapter, Jer. xxiii. 18–30, we read, "Therefore, thus saith the Lord concerning Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah king of Judah. They shall not lament for him saying, Ah, my brother! or Ah Lord! or Ah his glory! He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.....As I live, saith the Lord, though Coniah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, were the signet upon my right hand, yet would I pluck thee thence [because of his father's wickedness, and because the kingdom was then to be discontinued], and give thee over into the hand of the king of Babylon, and into the hand of the Chaldeans. I will cast thee out and thy mother that bare thee, into another country [Babylon] where ye were not born; and there shall ye die." This was all literally fulfilled. Jehoiakim's son, here called Coniah, was plucked off the throne of David, and he and his mother carried to Babylon. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, 10; and 2 Kings xxiv. 8–12. Thus we have the meaning of the prophecy, even as expressed in verse 30. "Thus saith the Lord, Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days." What does this mean? Let us see.

It does not mean that Coniah—Jechonias—was not the father of any children, for that would contradict both the Old Testament and the New, which tell us he was the father of Salathiel and others. However, at the time this was written of him—at the time he succeeded his father and began to reign independent of him [being the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign]—he was only eighteen years old, and was then, without doubt, the same as childless; that is, he had no child old enough to be king on the throne of David, although we are informed he had wives. 2 Kings xxiv. 17. But the announcement is, that neither Coniah nor his seed—descendants—were to prosper IN HIS DAYS—for the time being—that no man of his seed should prosper as a ruler on the throne of David in Judah "ANY MORE," at present. It was the same therefore, for the time being, as though he had been literally childless. Three months and ten days after that he was plucked off the throne and taken to Babylon. He had, however, been reigning in connection with his father, as we are informed, about ten years—from the time he was eight years old. When the king of Babylon dethroned him, while as yet he had no child old enough to succeed him, he therefore took his uncle, Mattaniah, and made him king and changed his name to Zedekiah. 2 Kings xxiv. 17. Thus we see God's way of bringing about the failure of a man to sit upon the throne of David, which he had so many times told them would occur unless they were obedient. In these facts therefore, we have the meaning of those words, write ye this man childless, that is, as to the present continuation and prosperity of the kingdom by any son of his, but not childless in fact, as to its ultimate restoration and endless prosperity through and under one of his descendants—Jesus Christ—according to the unconditional declarations of the covenant with David.

When Coniah was thus plucked off the throne as he was, by the direction of God, it was virtually the discontinuation of the kingdom because of the literal failure of a man to sit upon the throne of David. The kings and people altogether had become so corrupt and vile in the sight of God, that there was no remedy. In the wisdom of God it was therefore necessary to discontinue the kingdom, and to do it at once. He therefore plucked Jechoniah off the throne just at the time when in his wisdom and purpose it was absolutely necessary to do so. It turns out that Jechoniah had no seed or child old enough to be put upon the throne at that time; hence the literal failure of a man in the direct appointed line, and consequently the discontinuance not only of the prosperity but of the kingdom itself. The king of Babylon was permitted to make the uncle king, and change his name to Zedekiah—signifying Jehovah is mighty—this is all the result of his power and direction. (Zedekiah was not in the direct line, and his name is left out of the genealogies of Christ.)

The kingdom was not to prosper any more, and did not. He was just as wicked and rebellious as the others, and was called a profane and wicked prince of Israel. God sent his prophet to him to say, "Thou profane wicked prince of ISRAEL; [he was the representative of the entire nation—Prince of the kingdom of ISRAEL. The kingdom of the entire Hebrew nation was to be overturned in him] whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end; thus saith the Lord God; remove the diadem and take off the crown; this shall not be the same; exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him." Ezek. xxi 25.

Zedekiah was taken by the king of Babylon. "Then he slew the sons of Zedekiah in Riblah before his eyes: also the king of Babylon slew all the nobles of Judah. Moreover, he put out Zedekiah's eyes, and bound him with chains to carry him to Babylon." He also sacked the city of Jerusalem, burned and destroyed it. Although God had told them that, if they would be obedient, "this city shall remain forever." Jer. xvii 19–25. "The Lord God of their fathers sent unto them by his messengers rising up betimes, and sending; because he had compassion on his people and on his dwelling-place; but they mocked the messengers of God and despised his words and misused his prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against his people, until there was no remedy." 2 Chron. xxvi. 16. They had to be cast out. God must keep his word. He had told them over and over again for hundreds of years, that if they turned away from following him and from keeping his commandments, then he would "cast them out of the land," and destroy the city. Deut. iv. 25; Jer. xvi. 13; 1 Kings ix. 7. The time had now come. It was a great and important crisis in his dealings with his chosen people, and in his purpose.

The question is asked, Jer. xxii. 28, "Why are they cast out, he and his seed"—Jechoniah and his children or descendants, and all Israel, for the time being? Then the earth is called upon to hear the important declaration of God's purpose. "O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord." What is it? God's kingdom on the earth, which had been standing for over 500 years, is about to be discontinued, about to be overturned. A failure of a proper man to sit upon the throne is about to occur. "Thus saith the Lord, write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days: for no man of his seed shall prosper sitting upon the throne of David and ruling any more in Judah," until he come whose right it is, and who can fulfil the words of David, viz: "He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God." 2 Sam. xxiii. 3.

The time had arrived when that stiff-necked, disobedient, wicked people were to be cast out of God's chosen spot, and out of his constant guidance and protection; when his own literal rudimentary kingdom, on earth among men, was to cease and come to an end and be no more for a long, very long period—an interregnum of nearly twenty-five centuries, at least 2477 years—until his "OWN SON," his own representative, as well as man's representative, should be produced by his own power and in his own way; lay down his life for the people; be raised from the dead with an incorruptible nature, and endowed with all power; ascend up into heaven, during the development of his Father's purposes; and then return to reorganize and set up the kingdom of God in its perfect and permanent form. It was a great and important announcement that was to be made. That was the reason that the earth with all its peoples, was called upon to hear; and not because of the wickedness of either Jehoiakim or his son Jechoniah. They, as individuals, were no worse than others of the kings of Judah had been.

Jehoram, or Joram, the fifth king of Judah, was very wicked and actually murdered his six brothers; and "compelled Judah to sin:" and was therefore smitten by God until his bowels fell out, and was not permitted to be buried in the sepulchres of the kings." 2 Chron. xxi. 18–20.

Uzziah, the ninth king, abused so greatly that he was smitten by God with that terrible disease, leprosy, and continued a leper till his death.

Think also of the deplorable sins of Solomon, who was the third king of Israel. He was a child of promise, and a most important type of Christ; of whom it was said, "the Lord loved him," and therefore had him called "Jedidiah—beloved of the Lord;" 2 Sam. xii. 24; and "Shelomah—Prince of Peace;" the name given by the Lord nine years before he was born; and who was, as to his flesh, the incipiency or beginning of the flesh of Christ who "was made of the seed of David according to the flesh;" and who was so wise that it is said, "all the earth sought to Solomon to hear his wisdom, which God had put in his heart." Surely an important personage in God's purpose relative to his "own Son." Think, I say, of the way he forsook the Lord at a certain period of his life—how his "many strange women, seven hundred wives, princesses, and his three hundred concubines, turned away his heart after other gods;" (methinks enough to turn away any man's heart) so that it is said, Solomon did evil in the sight of the Lord, and went not fully after the Lord as did David his father. 1 Kings xi. 1–6. It is evident, however, that he subsequently repented and turned his heart again fully unto the Lord. His writings (Ecclesiastes and Proverbs) are evidence of this. He was God's appointed "Prince all the days of his life." But the twelve tribes were rent away, not only because Solomon had forsaken God, but "because they (the people) had forsaken him and did not walk in his ways, to do that which is right." 1 Kings xi. 33. But, note this. God said, "I will for this, (this forsaking him) afflict the seed of David (Solomon and his descendants, which include Jehoiakim and his son, but not all the people) BUT NOT FOREVER: and he said, "this thing is from me." 1 Kings xi. 9, 11, 33–39; and xii. 15, 24. No. David's seed not to be afflicted forever: for one of his seed, a descendant of Solomon, is still living and is to reign on his Father's throne forever.

Again, think of David's terrible sin at one time. He "despised the commandment of the Lord, killed Uriah (a good and worthy man) and took his wife to be his own wife." Shocking! Did Jehoiakim and Jechoniah do worse than this? "Howbeit the Lord would not destroy the house of David (the family or descendants of David) because of the covenant he had made with David, and as he had promised to give a light to him and his sons forever. 2 Chron. xxi. 17.

Oh the weakness and faultiness of human nature! But no matter how faulty and how wicked; the terrible sins and crimes of the descendants of David cannot be allowed to annul or make void or defeat the purpose of God. His promise, his unconditional covenant with David must be fulfilled. "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David; he will not turn from it. Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne. If thy children will keep my covenant and my testimony that I shall teach them, THEIR children shall also sit upon the throne forevermore," Psa. cxxxii. 11, without an interruption; without any interregnum: But if not, then it shall be discontinued; there shall be a vacation—a long interregnum.

Then again, the other line of kings, the kings of the ten-tribe kingdom, during their two hundred and fifty years of separation, were equally wicked and more so. It was said of king Ahab, that he "did more to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him." And God said by Elisha, that he would take away his posterity, and cut off his house—family. 1 Kings xxi. 21, 22.

Not only the kings, but the people also, "mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, till there was no remedy."

Thus the children of David and of Solomon, by their disobedience, forfeited their conditional privilege of rulership and uninterrupted continuance of the kingdom, which God granted them in such words as the following, to David and Solomon, both, namely, "IF thy children take heed to their ways, to walk before me in truth with all their heart and with all their soul, THERE SHALL NOT FAIL THEE (said he) A MAN ON THE THRONE OF ISRAEL. But if ye shall at all turn from following me, or your children, and will not keep my commandments and my statutes which I have set before you, but go and serve other gods, and worship them: then will I cut off Israel [the entire nation—rulers and subjects] out of the land which I have given them; and this house which I have hallowed for my name, will I cast out of my sight [cause it to be destroyed] and Israel [the entire Hebrew nation] shall be a byword among ALL PEOPLE." 1 Kings ix. 4; ix. 4–7. [Not the ten tribes in England, and the two tribes scattered among all people, as taught by Anglo-Israelism.]

The whole nation, except some individual cases, failed to keep the condition; and as the result, there is and has been ever since Jeconiah and Zedekiah were "plucked" off the throne, a failure of a man to sit upon the throne of David. The failure of Solomon and his children or descendants, was a failure of David's children. The failure of a man to sit upon the throne was a failure to David as well as to Solomon. The words to David were, "There shall not fail thee a man," if thy children are obedient. It will be seen, as before shown, that the failure was not on account of the disobedience and wickedness of merely two or three individual kings, like Solomon, Jehoiakim and Jechoniah, but of the nation, rulers and ruled; and that it was not a change from the line of kings, through which the royal heir was to come, to another line; and also that the failure is not a total or endless one, but only a temporary one; a vacancy of the throne and kingdom for the time being; and which interregnum we are expecting soon to terminate by the appearance upon the scene of the rightful never-dying heir.

No, it is not an utter failure; for God's word to Daniel is, "If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; if they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgressions with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes, [beginning with Solomon, 2 Sam. vii. 14, and which he has been doing ever since; nevertheless my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to FAIL. My Covenant will I not break, nor ALTER the thing that has gone out of my lips.....His seed shall endure forever, his throne as the sun before me.....But thou hast cast off [the last kings off the throne, and the people off the land] and abhorred, thou hast been wroth with thine anointed. [David's representatives, Solomon, Jehoiakim, Jechoniah, etc.] Thou hast made void the covenant of thy servant [David] thou hast profaned his crown by casting it to the ground [for the time being but not utterly] thou hast made his glory to cease, and cast his throne down to the ground;" until he come whose right it is. Psa. lxxxix. 30–44. This is exact truth spoken and written prophetically.

In the light of all this, it looks like a lack of careful examination and thought, and consequently a misapprehension, otherwise a lack of faith in God's word, for any person to say, "gives the whole question away in trying to make out that Jesus came of the stock of Jechonias." It is trying to make out and giving away the question, to quote the word of God—the plain words of Scripture—and rest the whole question on them? (Matt. i. 11, 12; Luke iii. 27; 1 Chron. iii. 16, 17; and other Scriptures as I have shown.) Is there any doubt as to the meaning of the word "begat?" But are there not grand-sons, and sons-in-law, as well as begotten sons? Have I not presented the only genealogies of "Jesus Christ the son of David," given in God's word? Do they not harmonize with God's covenant with David? Do not all of both lines below Jechonias, descend through Salathiel his son, and Zorobabel? Was Jeconias, think you, any worse, or even as bad as other kings before him? Can we get around these conclusions without denying God's word? Should we reject or even doubt his word? Was it not the disobedience and wickedness of the rulers and people generally, that was the cause of their being "cast off," and of the discontinuance and downfall of the kingdom, and their deplorable condition ever since?

LETTER FROM PALESTINE.

I am rejoiced to hear that an iron house is to be sent to our shores. An iron house will be a novelty, and should it prove to be suitable and right for this climate, as I expect it will be, such houses will find a ready sale here. I shall be happy to see the American flag floating over the little iron house to remind me of my native country, which we used to call "the home of the free."

During my stay in Jerusalem most of the time for a period of over thirty years, I have never ceased to love America and its people. It is impossible to express my feelings upon that point, and any service rendered by Americans to my brethren in the Holy Land, is prized more by me than though it were from any other country. Nothing but the more glorious future can cause me to cease loving America, its government and people.

Yesterday I visited the grounds where the new Russian Hospice is being built. About two hundred workmen are engaged cutting and fitting stone. It was a pleasing sight; though it is the work of the Russian government, improvements by any power are welcome to us here at this time. But it would be much more pleasant to see the same progressive work carried on by your people, and I have faith to believe that such will be the case in due time.

The Russian tower on Mount Olives, has already risen to the height of ninety feet. The work has ceased on account of the rains, but it will be finished next year. The height, when complete will be nearly one hundred and twenty feet. They will then have been three years building it. The large bell in the top of this tower will be distinctly heard at Jaffa, Jericho, Hebron and beyond the Jordan. You will remember this bell was brought up to Jerusalem from the sea upon a carriage built expressly for the purpose at Jaffa, and drawn by five hundred pilgrims. That was the only way in which it could have been brought up.

Upon visiting Jaffa lately, to my joyful surprise, I found the road between Jerusalem and that city had been greatly improved since I last passed that way. I saw with my own eyes about two thousand men at work cutting through the mountains and levelling up the valleys. I was so astonished at first that I said, "Can this be Palestine? or am I dreaming?" But the reality was before my eyes and I could only return thanks to our God who moves the hearts of all men to do his will. The bed of the road, where finished, is as smooth as a floor and very beautiful. There is something inspiring and encouraging in the very fact and appearance of this road, as it winds its way among the grand old hills of Judea and over the flowery plains of Sharon to the blue waters of the Mediterranean. Soon we will see the most elegant carriages rolling over it to the "City of our God."

As all acknowledge, great credit is due Rauph Pasha, who superintends this work in person; and also Mayor Selim Effendi; who has left his beautiful mansion in the city, and whom I found living in a humble tent by the roadside. His excellency Rauph Pasha, and also his excellency Salim Effendi, only commenced their terms of office about three years ago; but more has been accomplished in the direction of real progress during their administration than ever before since Gentile domination, and we earnestly pray that the lives of these noble men may be spared to see the fruits of their labors; and that they may be agents under God of doing much more towards the restoration of his people and city. I am sure that God prepares agents to labor for reforms and improvements, and these men are most certainly of that class.

I am sorry to be obliged to inform you that the Rabbi from Warsaw has been unable to buy land for colonization on account of the Sultan prohibiting the natives from selling. But he has purchased several gardens about three hours from Tiberias, where he will plant citron groves; and families will be sent from Jerusalem to take care of them, which will make good homes for many. The citron fruit is of great value and is exported to all parts of the world.

The fine block which Mr. Trumbauer has been building is nearly finished; and we have already commenced upon another near the Damascus gate, of which I will give some account in the future. I have now under my care the erection of four buildings, and consequently have little leisure.

I can see very distinctly that God has put his Spirit in the hearts of the rulers and people of Jerusalem to prepare places for his people, "Who are at hand to come." Those who build do not seek their personal interests altogether, but seem to be looking more particularly to the improvement of the country. Is not this remarkable? To me it seems to be a most wonderful fulfillment of prophecy.

The block of tenement houses on Mount Tabor, upon which I have been engaged eight months is completed. It will accommodate twelve families.

In excavating near the Damascus gate, we found an ancient cistern, of great capacity, cut out of solid rock. Such cisterns are of great value. We found the mouth of the cistern covered with an immense slab which we are using in building. One cannot dig about Jerusalem much without discovering ruins and many things of great interest. We have also discovered a canal which we hope will lead us to another valuable cistern. The cisterns and wells cut out of the solid rock are still in a very good state of preservation and need but little repairing.

The government is now pulling down the old walls around the castle of David's tower near the Jaffa gate, and will build a handsome wall with iron finish which will make a most decided improvement, as it is situated on the most sightly spot in the city.

The Hebron road is being pushed forward and soon we shall have a splendid highway between Jerusalem and Machpelah's sepulchre which contains the three patriarchs, Abraham with Sarah, Isaac with Rebecca, and Jacob with Leah. Carriages of some kind will run daily between these two cities, a distance of about eighteen miles. Many will buy land and make residences in this really beautiful city of Hebron, which David chose for the capital of his kingdom, and where, perhaps, the kingdom of our Messiah will be set up.

I wish to acknowledge my most heartfelt thanks to Raupt Pasha of Jerusalem, for the strong protection he is giving to all the improvements which are being pushed forward in the city and country; and also to Mayor Salim for his untiring zeal, and the interest he manifests in all the public works. It appears to me evident that these men, who have ruled over us and superintend our public works, are taking more interest in the welfare of Jerusalem, with the small means at their command, than any other officials do in any other place, either in Europe or America. But we all admit, at the same time, that "there exists a power behind the throne" which doeth all things and which can never fail.

Mr. Sawetzki, president of the Baron De. Rothschild's colonies in Palestine, visited Jerusalem recently with the object of securing a competent teacher for the new colony at Akron. He selected one from Mr. Baskar's school, a teacher who had received a thorough education in the Hebrew, French and Arabic languages.

I saw a man from Haifa this week who told me the government was going to build good roads from Haifa, Acre, and Beyrout to Nazareth, Tiberias and the Hauran. All know that the Hauran is one of the finest grain countries in the world; but hitherto the expense of conveying it to the coast has been so great that it brings no wealth to the country. When these new roads are built, the gold and silver of the nations will flow to this land as money does now to the western states of America, for grain; until the population shall increase to consume the vast quantities that the large country northeast of us is capable of producing.

The Lord fulfills prophecy in harmony with the laws of science and the wants of his people; thus it is often accomplished when man does not perceive it and while he is looking for marvelous events to occur. The spirit of progress is being poured out all over this land, and the restoration has already as surely commenced as the putting forth of leaves is evidence that summer is nigh; and my ardent desire is that my brethren and friends in America may be drawn by the promises of what is to be done here and hasten to share in the rich blessings which are soon to be realized.—*N. OUR meetings in Plymouth were continued until Tuesday evening, Nov. 22. As a result, four young persons yielded the obedience of faith, and were baptised by Brother Woodward in Yellow River on Monday. The preaching was done by Brother Woodward and his discourses were instructive and eminently practical. We enjoyed some good interesting social meetings, as the little church took hold of the work. A good impression has been left on the minds of the community, and our brethren and sisters feel to engage in the Lord's service with renewed energy and more entire consecration to the dear Redeemer's cause.

THE TEN VIRGINS.

Brother Silas Hunt, of Dudley, England, sends us an exposition of our Lord's parable on the Ten Virgins in which he greatly differs from the generally received view. While not as yet indorsing his explanation, it may be said in his favor that the Syriac Version seems to sustain his position, at least in part. It reads: "Then may the kingdom of heaven be shadowed forth by ten virgins, who took their lamps and went out to meet the bridegroom and bride." We were too deeply interested and engaged in that solemn movement of 1843 and 1844 to ever forget it. Although we were all sadly disappointed, yet the writer has an unwavering belief that the warning then given to the church, and to the world, was heaven ordained, and came at the right time. This particular point we propose to consider in a future number of our paper. At this time it may be better to say something of a practical nature. As the true church of God has not lost her love for the Bridegroom, his tarrying only seems to intensify her longing for his return. A groaning creation is in birth-pangs for the regenesis. An eminent author has said, speaking on this subject, "Nature—uncorrupted nature—through all her regions, cries aloud for him who is to rectify her unwilling disorders, to repair her shattered structures, to restore her oppressed energies, to vindicate her voice of conscience, long despised,—her sublime testimony to the Creator, so long questioned or overlooked. But what is this to the demand of grace for the coming of him who is not only the great God, but our Savior? Tit. ii. 13. If the whole creation groaneth and travaileth together in pain for the manifestation of the Sons of God, what shall be the desires of the sons of God themselves! What shall be their ardor to realise that liberty of the children of God, of which such great things are spoken; to behold their own lowliness glorified in the glory of the man of Nazareth, their humble labors recognized by the approval of a God once more manifest in the flesh, their persevering faith vindicated, their hope consummated, their charity brightening into a reward eternal and infinite. They know well the value of that union which identifies the triumph of the Savior and the saved. They rejoice to think that, as a humiliated Redeemer came first to point us to the path of humiliation, so must a glorified Redeemer point us the path of glory, that the Captain of salvation, who bore the cross in front of his army of believers, must come to teach them also how to wear the crown.

Yes; all proclaims and demands the return of Christ to the world,—all but the unsanctified heart of man! There alone no voice is heard to welcome the mighty stranger. There alone the dawn of this eternal day is contemplated with hatred, horror and dismay. Hearts that are inured to the world's corruptions, how shall they hail an immortality of meekness, simplicity, and love? Spirits habituated to seek unholy ends by means yet more unholy, how shall they endure the bringing in of an everlasting righteousness? Those whose whole hopes, prospects, and calculations are bound up with the fortunes of the world as it is, how shall they regard otherwise than with terror this awful revolution in the administration of the universe, when he who now rules behind a mass of permitted evil, shall himself personally and visibly assume the reins of universal empire?" O, how solemn were the hours when that tenth day of the seventh month was moving by. Those that passed that ordeal of heart searching, and heart-consecration, well know what it was to be crucified to this world. One has well said, that to inspire watchfulness, and to cherish anticipation, God has permitted gleams of light to cross the darkness; to baffle presumption he has made them only gleams." But never in all the history of the Church have the gleams shone out upon her desert pathway so brightly as they have gleamed out upon this now passing generation. Upon the longing sight of the weary watchers the "last lovely morning" will soon dawn to usher in the splendors of an eternal day. Watchfulness and earnest prayer are now most imperatively necessary if we would be found of our soon-coming Savior "without spot and blameless."

GOD IN HISTORY.

It was said by a popular historian that "God is in history." It is a grand conception of the prescience and providence of God to realise that all that pertains to the rise and fall of nations, to the establishment and overturning of governments is so pre-arranged and controlled as to assure the believer in a Creator of this world, and in a dispenser of its affairs, that the final outcome of all revolutions will be a "kingdom that cannot be moved." From chaos, in its "voidness and wasteness" was evolved a world and an Eden, over which the sons of God exulted, and, in the contemplation of which, the Morning Stars sang their sweetest anthems. Christ was a man of sorrows, and ended a sad, weary life on the cross; but that lowly suffering life, and that agonizing crucifixion, led onward to the brightest crown, and the most exalted supremacy the Heavenly Father had to bestow. The pathway of the Church to immortal life and imperishable honors has been along a pathway of blood and through the tortures of the horrible Roman Inquisition.

But this bloody pathway leads to the golden city, and these insufferable agonies to ecstasies unalloyed. The tears and heart-aches precede the undying joys and the everlasting rejoicings. The thorn and the brier line the weary road that leads to the groves planted with the "tree of life." The parched and thirsty lips, that drain Marah's bitter waters, will one day drink the crystal stream that shall gladden the city of our God. God works the "formless and the void" into a Paradise of delights, and he will evolve New Heavens and a New Earth from this old creation under the curse. God is in history though earthly kingdoms pass away. The grand march of events is toward God's everlasting kingdom, if it be over the "ruins of empires." Though dust and debris may make the grave of idolatrous Babylon, and though Rome, the centre and sink of abominations Pagan and Papal, may be utterly barred in judgment fires, yet the New Jerusalem shall one day lift its golden spires into the cloudless, pelucid atmosphere of the world made new. Earth's golden age is in the future, and will be realised when God shall "make all things new." Though death and the grave are here, yet immortality and incorruptibility shall be made triumphant. Evil in God's universe is temporary, not permanent. God is in history. Providence "walks not with aimless feet." History's final consummation will be reached when "God shall be all in all."

BAPTISM.

As our Bible Lesson in the present number, is on baptism, we take the following from an exchange, which was written as a notice of a Lexicon of the Greek New Testament recently published. The extract from the work gives full and accurate definitions of all the original words which refer to the ordinance. We trust our readers will carefully read and ponder these definitions in connection with the Bible Lesson.

A VALUABLE WORK.

The Messrs. Harper and Brothers have just issued a voluminous book of 750 double-column quarto pages, which bears the following title:—

"A Greek English Lexicon of the New Testament; being Grimm's Wilke's Clavis Novi Testamenti, Translated, Revised, and Enlarged, by Joseph Henry Thayer, D. D., Bussey Professor of New Testament Criticism and interpretation in the Divinity School of Harvard University. New York: Harper and Brothers, Franklin Square. 1887."

This work, or the Latin original from which it is rendered, has received the highest commendation from scholars on both sides of the Atlantic. Professor Grimm, of Jena, has sanctioned all changes and additions in the present edition that would better adapt this dictionary to the English-speaking public. The translator and editor of this lexicon is a Congregationalist. Having said this much by way of preliminary, we will now quote extended definitions of the Greek words baptizo, baptisma, baptismos, baptistes, and bapto, as found in the above-named work.

"BAPTIZO (verb) I. 1. Properly to dip repeatedly, immerse, submerge (of vessels sunk, Polyb. 1. 51, 6; 8. 8, 4; of animals. Diod. 1. 36). 2. To cleanse by dipping or submerging, to wash, to make clean with water; in the mid. and the 1 aor. pass. to wash one's self, bathe; so Mark 7: 4; Luke 11: 38; 2 Kings 5: 14. 3. Metaphorically, to overwhelm, to be overwhelmed with calamities, of those who must bear them, Matt. 20: 22; Mark 10: 38. II. In the New Testament it is used particularly of the rite of sacred ablution, first instituted by John the Baptist, afterward by Christ's command received by Christians and adjusted to the contents and nature of their religion, viz., an immersion in water, performed as a sign of the removal of sin, and administered to those who, impelled by a desire for salvation, sought admission to the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom. a. The word is used absolutely to administer the rite of ablution, to baptize. b. With prepositions, eis, to, to mark the element into which the immersion is made; eis ton Jordanen, Mark 1: 9. bb. en, with dative, of the thing in which one is immersed: en to Jordane, Mark 1: 5. En pneumati hagio, to imbue richly with the Holy Spirit; with the addition of kai puri, to overwhelm with fire (those who do not repent), i. e., to subject them to the terrible penalties of hell, Matt. 3: 11.

"BAPTISMA (noun). A word peculiar to New Testament and ecclesiastical writers, immersion, submersion. 1. Used tropically of calamities and afflictions with which one is quite overwhelmed; Matt. 20: 22; Mark 10: 38; Luke 12: 50. 2. Of John's baptism, that purificatory rite by which men on confessing their sins were bound to a spiritual reformation, obtained the pardon of their past sins, and became qualified for the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom soon to be set up; Matt. 3: 7; 21: 25; Acts 1: 22; 10: 37. 3. Of Christian baptism; this, according to the view of the apostles, is a rite of sacred immersion, commanded by Christ, by which men confessing their sins and professing their faith in Christ, are born again by the Holy Spirit unto a new life, come into the fellowship of Christ and the church, and are made partakers of eternal salvation.

"BAPTISMOS. A washing, purification effected by means of water; Mark 7: 4, 8; of the washings prescribed by the Mosaic law, Heb. 9: 10. (Among profane writers, Josephus alone uses the word, and of John's baptism.)

"BAPTISTES. A baptizer; one who administers the rite of baptism; the surname of John, the forerunner of Christ. Matt. 3: 1; 11: 11.

"BAPTO. a. To dip, dip in, immerse; John 13: 26. b. To dip into dye, to dye, color; Rev. 19: 13."

The above definitions are copied verbatim, with the emphasized words, from Dr. Joseph Henry Thayer's new Greek-English Lexicon. What a convincing argument on the question of baptism!

A REPORT OF STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING.

It is requested that we make a brief report of the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of The Christian Publishing Association, and in compliance with the desire I will say, The Stockholders met as per notice published, on Saturday, Nov. 12, 1887. Meeting was called to order by I. G. Roberts, Vice President of the Board of last year, and on motion J. H. Willey was chosen Chairman, and J. L. Wines Secretary.

A report was made by the treasurer, showing that the debt of $594.00 due one year ago, had been paid, and the paper issued according to contract for the past year.

A new Board of Directors was then elected to serve the coming year, consisting of Robert Railsback, William Railsback, W. D. Thompson, J. H. Willey, and A. R. Underwood.

At a meeting of the Directors, held on Monday, Nov. 14, 1887, a contract was made with S. A. Chaplin to Edit THE RESTITUTION for another year. By this contract his salary is increased materially, he is relieved of some of the detail work of the office, and has agreed to write one or more columns of editorial matter for each issue for the coming year. It was the unanimous expression of all that the Editor request all correspondents to write shorter and more practical articles than has been the custom, and that the brethren and sisters be urged to write more short letters and communications, telling of every day Christian walk and conversation. We hope the brotherhood will take this work in hand, and fairly flood the Editorial room with the articles we all love the best.

The contract to publish the paper for the coming year was let to A. R. Underwood, who will have charge of all business connected with the office in any way.

The friends of THE RESTITUTION every where are requested to try and do just a little more than ever before. If each one will only get ONE new name for us, the list will be doubled. A better paper can then be given our patrons, and more and better work can be done for the Master's cause. The time is short, brethren, we have but few years to labor at best, and it behooves us all to lose no time. Do not sit still waiting for an opportunity to do something for Jesus; but stir about, and you will find occasions for your charity at every turn. Editor and Publisher will do all in their power to make THE RESTITUTION more useful than ever before in spreading the glad news of the soon coming Savior. Will you do your part? We trust you will.

A. R. UNDERWOOD,
Secretary for the Board.

OUR MISSION HOUSE, SPITAL-FIELDS, CROWDED WITH JEWS.

שבת תשובה

Mr. Friedberger, our missionary, who came from Birmingham to London, is having a blessed time at the Mission House, which is at present unusually well attended. The approaching winter tide fair to be a busy one; at the Mission House; so we pray that the Lord's blessing may rest on all the workers, that they may be upheld in their difficult task.

The Saturday before the day of Atonement—called שבת תשובה—the Hall was nearly full. The congregation consisted of Jews from all parts of the world—principally young men; but also some Hebrew Christians and a few Gentile-Christians came to encourage Messrs. Friedberger and Hoeder, and Mrs. Zuckerkandl in their labor for the winter season.

Mr. Friedberger opened the service with prayer in Hebrew, and after the hymn, "I hear Thy welcome voice," had been sung, he read Isaiah lv. in Hebrew, and gave a most interesting exposition of it.

When a solo had been sung by Miss Pash, Mr. Dunlop engaged in prayer, after which Mr. Roeder addressed the meeting in German on the feast "Rosh Hoshanah," which the Jews had celebrated a few days before. During the month of Tishri, he said, Israel celebrates three great feasts—the New Year, the Day of Atonement, and the Feast of Tabernacles. After some introductory remarks, he continued:—"Israel, scattered all over the world, is still a nation, keeping its fast and feast days as in the days of glory; and so long as we (Jews) with all our sorrows and joys, our sufferings and our prospects, move—even in a modern society—as a people, so long we are living witnesses for the truthfulness of God's Word, and form the best argument on behalf of the inspiration of the Bible. Contrary to other peoples, who regard the first of January as the beginning of the New Year, the Jew keeps the first of Tishri as his ראש השנה New Year's Day. Can you tell why? He imagines or pretends that on that day the world was called into existence. Do you find anything about it in this book—your Bible? Yes; we find—Exodus xii. 2, xiii. 4—that the month of Abib, or Nisan, was to be the beginning of months, because in that month Israel was delivered from the bondage of Egypt, and took its place as a nation among the peoples. But why do the Jews keep the first day of the seventh month as their New Year's Day? In Numbers xxix. 1–6 we find that the first of Tishri shall be a day of blowing the trumpets—יום תרועה—a special sacrifice had to be brought unto the Lord; no work was to be done, and a holy convocation was to be held. This was the feast ordained by God, and in accordance with this command in every synagogue the shophar (horn) sounds forth, Numbers x. 10; Leviticus xxiii. 23, but we do not find anything whatever about a New Year's Day. The prayers offered in the synagogues are most solemn; all sorts of sins are confessed, but one sin they do not bring before God—the rejection of Jesus of Nazareth, Israel's Savior. All the prayers, all the tunes of the shophar are in vain, so long as he—"the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world"—is not acknowledged. The different tunes, which are given in succession, about 30 in number, from the shophar are sounded in hope that the right tune, which was heard from Mount Sinai, when the law was given, Exodus xix. 16, may be hit upon. The true melody will not be heard until songs of praise to Jesus will re-echo from every synagogue. There is one synagogue, thank God, where the right tune is sounded, where the true melody has been found, where they sing with renewed hearts the song of Moses and of the Lamb, who is the Lion of the tribe of Judah, Israel's Shephord and Israel's King. When Mr. Dunlop, the gentleman before you, visited a few years ago Kischineff, a Hebrew-Christian community was founded there, who now assembles in their temple under Joseph Rabinowitz to pray to the God of our fathers and to our God in the blessed name of Jesus. This congregation has the right tune, and spreads its influence over the whole Russian empire and still further. The glad tidings of great joy have reached even Siberia, where a Jew, Jacob Zebi Schulman, for years a believer in Jesus, was, in consequence of his faith, falsely accused by his brethren and transported by the Russian Government to Siberia. There he heard of this Movement, and his heart was filled with joy that Israel is awaking there without rabbis to hinder their faith in Jesus as the Messiah, their Savior. From another part (Hungary) we have encouraging news about Rabbi Lichtenstein, who has given a beautiful testimony for Christ. From Galicia we hear that Mr. Faber will go thither to establish a Hebrew-Christian church; and is it not a proof that Israel begins to move, when we look around and see such an assembly of Jews here even today, the Sabbath before the Day of Atonement. My brethren, I beseech you do not bury your heads like the ostrich in the sand; do not remain blind to what is going on in the world; remember that your indifference, or your feigned blindness, would not alter the facts. Keep this day, keep your ראש השנה by all means, and begin a new year, a new life, praying to God, that it may please him to pour out his Spirit on Israel, that the time may speedily come, when Jews and Gentiles shall bow their knees before Jesus, and confess him to be the Christ, the Lord of glory.

Mr. Dunlop then addressed the meeting in English in his usual eloquent and earnest manner. He kept the whole congregation in rapt attention, and his illustrations evidently made a deep impression upon many of his Jewish hearers. Mr. Friedberger closed the meeting with the Benediction.

Afterwards Mr. Friedberger invited them to the Reading Room, where tea was served, and where a lively but friendly and interesting discussion was kept up. Twenty-six Jews remained after this, in order to attend the Night School.

The Sabbath following, October 1st, the attendance was larger still, when Mr. R——spoke on "The Day of Atonement." On Sabbath, October 8th, the subject was "The Feast of Tabernacles." On Sabbath October 15th, the Hall was crowded. Mrs. Brown sung most touchingly two beautiful solos, and Mr. Levinsohn prayed most fervently for the work, and for his people Israel. In the evening a class had to be arranged up-stairs, as the Hall was too small to accommodate the number who remained for the school. We are greatly in want of more teachers, as the school is open every night. We hope that some friends will come forward to help us. —M. A., in Jewish Herald.

What the Jewish Papers are Saying.

THE JEWS OF OREGON.

In the days of the apostles, Greece must have had a very large Jewish population, for in every one of the numerous pieces of the peninsula that Paul visited in succession, we are generally told in the "Acts" that he found a synagogue within which he would generally dispute with the Jews, and seek to instruct them in the Gospel of Christ, so as to make them understand that it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth "to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." There was, for example, in Paul's days, a flourishing synagogue at Athens, to which the apostle of the Gentiles repaired before he addressed to the people of that city his celebrated oration about the Unknown God.

Very little seems to be left of the congregations of Jews that existed in Hellas in the first century of the Christian era, and some of which became the nucleus of the churches which the apostles founded or established in different places of the peninsula. In the July number of the reports of the Alliance Israelite Universelle, we find an account of the state of the Jews in the Kingdom of George I., from which we cull the following particulars:

At Athens, which now contains near 90,000 inhabitants, the number of Jews does not exceed 250, or about forty families. Only a few of these are of "Ashkenasim" descent, whereas by far the largest number are Sephardim, hailing from Constantinople, Smyrna, Salonica, and the Ionian Islands, who first came to Athens about thirty years ago. All the Jewish children are educated in Christian schools, and not the least ill-feeling exists between them and their Gentile schoolmaster. But no provisions of any kind are made for their religious instruction, and from this the correspondent of the Alliance derives the worst apprehensions. The Athens synagogue is a very different thing from what it must have been in the days of Paul. The writer says:

"The place in which public worship is celebrated is a very poor affair indeed. It is a low and narrow room, holding no more than twenty persons. If there are more worshippers, they must stand outside in the yard. The impression I carried away with me after visiting this synagogue is most unfavorable. The Government has made the congregation a present of some land to build a new synagogue on; but this site is at a considerable distance from the centre of town, and the means required for the new building do not exist."

Politically speaking, the Jews of Greece, whose aggregate number is about 6,000, are very favorably situated. The Greek constitution secures equal rights to people professing any creed. Socially also it cannot be said that there exists anything like an invidious line of demarcation between Jews and Gentiles, and the sideboards of some firms exhibit quite a suggestive mixture of Old Testament and Hellenic names, such as: Levy-Vassiliades-Arabantinos, or Cohen-Leon.

The French Historian, M. Guizot, who died a few years ago, and who for a long period was notorious for his scepticism, enshrined in his will the following testimony, which has just been made public: "I have examined, I have doubted, I have believed that the human mind had power enough to solve the problems presented by man and by the universe, and that the human will had force enough to regulate human life according to the dictates of law and morality. After a long life spent in thought and action, I became, and I am still, convinced that neither the universe is competent to regulate its own movements, nor man to govern his own destiny by means only of the permanent laws by which they are ordered. It is my profound conviction that God, who created this universe and man, governs, preserves, and modifies them either by the action of general laws, which we call natural, or by special act, which we call supernatural. I have, therefore, returned to the faith of my childhood. I am still firmly attached to the use of my reason, and to the free will which are my gifts from God, and my birthright and my title of honor upon earth, yet I have learned to feel myself a child in the hands of God, and sincerely resigned to my large share of ignorance and weakness. I believe in God, and worship him. I see his presence and his action, not only in the unchangeable laws of the universe, and in the secret life of the soul, but in the history of human society, and especially in the Old and New Testaments—those records of Revelation, and of the Divine action of the mediation and sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ for the salvation of the human race."

Freedom in Jail.

"In the spring of 1885 during nine weeks time, the city of Boston issued 2870 licenses to sell intoxicating drink, and two permits to preach the gospel on the public grounds. There had been thousands of licenses granted before, but for years no permits for preaching had been granted by the Common Committee, the chairman of which was described in court by a policeman under oath as "a wholesale and retail rumseller."

For preaching the gospel on Boston Common, without a permit from the "wholesale and retail rumseller," after permits had been repeatedly applied for and publicly refused, seven persons were summoned into court, prosecuted and fined. The cases were appealed,—the appeals were overruled and the following were punished: Dr. A. J. Gordon, by a fine; W. F. Davis, by a fine; U. B. Peckham by a fine and imprisonment; H. L. Hastings, by fine and imprisonment. More than one half of the parties being convicted, sentenced, and fined, to stand committed till the five was paid; H. L. Hastings being required to pay forty dollars or remain in Charles street jail for four months for this great crime.

When H. L. Hastings was brought into court, he was placed in the dock with twenty-three common drunkards, not one of whom was fined as heavily as he was for reading the Bible and preaching the gospel on Boston Common; and in this year of grace, 1887, a City Government which does special honor to rumsellers and pugilists, has again and again fined W. F. Davis fifty dollars—the largest fine which the city charter allows them to impose—for preaching the gospel on Boston Common. And at this moment, Oct. 20, 1887, he is lying in Charles street jail, where he must remain for a year unless a fine of some $350 is paid, for the heinous offence of preaching the gospel of Christ on Boston Common without a permit from the Roman Catholic authorities who rule the city of Boston.

The explanation of this fact may be found when we consider that seven out of eleven of the population of Boston are foreigners by birth or by parentage, that three-quarters of the prisoners in the Massachusetts State's prison are foreigners; that about four-fifths of the paupers, and criminals in public institutions about Boston are foreigners; that the politics of Boston are mostly under the control of liberty-loving Irish rumsellers, and that they largely choose their own friends and fellow-countrymen to fill the offices and administer the affairs of the city of Boston. Here is one aspect of the Irish question which should not be overlooked. Irishmen love liberty, hate tyranny, and flee from Ireland to escape British oppression. They land in America and enjoy the liberties, the privileges, the schools, and the institutions which they never could have gained in their own country, and which my ancestors came over and helped to plant in the wilderness in 1635; and which for four successive generations they as ministers of the gospel have upheld. And now these same liberty-loving, whisky-drinking, tyranny-hating Irish patriots turn around and show their love for liberty by locking me up in Charles street jail for reading the Bible on Boston Common, while at the same time they hire a brass band to go there and play jigs Sunday afternoons in defiance of State law, and tax me to pay the piper, when I do not dance nor wish to hear the music.

That is the way the gospel fares at the hands of rum-ridden and priest-ridden Boston, under an Irish Roman Catholic government. Is it not time for a change?

One evening last summer we started with the gospel wagon of the Y. M. C. A. to preach in the streets of Boston. We gave a gospel talk to four or five hundred quiet listeners who gathered at the corner of Charles and Boylston streets, and then the wagon drove on, and halted on Charles street, near Cambridge street, near an electric light which cast its rays on the entrance of Charles street jail of famous memory. Some hymns were sung, and then a gentleman was to give a temperance address, with black-board illustrations. He had hardly commenced when missiles began to fly, and whack came an egg! which struck him on the side of the face. He wiped his face, stood fire, and went on with his talk. The people cried "shame!" at the outrage, and hundreds of them listened with interest and attention till the address was concluded. We met this gentleman not long ago and he recalled the circumstance and said, "That egg came out of a rum shop near by, and that rum shop is kept by a member of the Boston Common Council."

It is a wonder that the egg wasn't rotten! But the incident will give an idea of the character of the men who are so interested about preaching on the Common.—The Christian.

PATIENT CONTINUANCE IN WELL-DOING.

Near the borders of the blossom,
Let the morrow bear its own;
If the morning sky be pleasant,
Why the coming night bemoan?

If the darkened heavens lower,
Wrap thy cloak around thy form:
Though the tempest rise in power,
God is mightier than the storm.

Steadfast faith and hope unshaken
Animate the trusting breast;
Step by step the journey's taken
Nearer to the land of rest.

All unseen, the Master walketh
By the toiling servant's side;
Comfortable words he talketh,
While his hands uphold and guide.

Grief, nor pain, nor any sorrow
Reads thy breast to Him unknown.
He today and he tomorrow,
Grace sufficient gives his own.

Holy strivings nerve and strengthen
Long endurance wins the crown:
When the evening shadows lengthen,
Then shall lay the burden down.

SYMBOLS AND TYPES.

In order to secure a correct conclusion, a proper and correct beginning is necessary; and therefore would I follow the advice of one when advising with this object in view: "Gentlemen define your terms!" Aware as I am, that a want of understanding, has misled many well intentioned persons, I am the more impressed with my subject, than I otherwise might be. A symbol, then, is a type, an emblem; a type is a mark, an emblem; an emblem is a picture imaging a truth, a type. These definitions are sufficient for our purpose, and therefore we proceed to a further consideration, of the symbolism of the Book; in which perhaps, a greater display of these are found, than in any other book. A writer has well said, "The various modes of communicating the will of God to man, are revealed from heaven thus:—1st. Sounds. 2nd. Written signs. 3d. Types, and 4th. In Symbols." All these are appropriately employed by him, who in all cases has beautifully, because harmoniously blended the sounds, signs, types and symbols.

It shall be no part of mine, in this paper to beg or steal points where none really exist; I mean by this, I am not going to manufacture or create, but in as clear and as forcible a manner as possible, present such thoughts as shall come to me, either from what others have said, or what I may determine from my standpoint of observation. I am well and fully aware, at the outset, as my mind runs over the brief history of my religious life of the past thirty years; how many have written on the symbolic character of the books of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, Daniel, and the Apocalypse. Torture, is a mild word, to express the way in which men have harassed themselves, and racked their brains, to give answers to symbols, sufficiently expressive in themselves; and today, we have not far to go in order to find this same element in humanity; a disposition rather to distort; wrench from its legitimate place and bearing, those clearly defined symbols, which, the Book like, explain themselves. My observation leads me to see, too great a disposition on the part of exponents, or would be exponents, of the symbolism of the Bible, to manufacture out of whole cloth, and as I have known, where men arrogate to themselves names and titles which belonged to those of the past ages, or are yet to come and unjustly claim that to which they have no just right or title.

"It is a distinguishing mark of symbols, that they are represented to the Seer as visibly acting out their mission," exhibiting conditions, relations, qualities and characteristics which they represent; let me illustrate. The four beasts which Daniel saw fully represent forms of government afterward to arise; these symbolic beasts, have all the elements in them, that are found in all human forms of government. The principal feature, as it appears to me, in them is a greater ferocity, that as the exigencies of the case demand, so are they competent for the assigned task. It is a mark of symbols, as a mode of revelation, that all the intellectual faculties are brought into requisition, as—sensation, memory, imagination, judgment and reason to unfold them. But in literal prophecies, there is merely an appeal to the judgment and memory. The events are simply described as coming to pass. Our judgment tells us the meaning of the terms, and our memories treasure up the events. In reading the Bible, as in any other book, we need to exercise precision of thought, lest we lose sight of the object before us; if we have before us the construction of the Tabernacle with all its appurtenances, and the mind of the maker of the ark; two cubits and a half long, and a cubit and a half the breadth, and a cubit and a half high, and the overlaying of it with gold; we should not from this (so I think), conclude that these measures were necessarily typical or symbolic. The same line of proportion is held to now, and considered good!

It seems however, to me, that in the construction of the ark, there was symbolism, both comprehensive and clear. This ark was the container of the two tables of testimony, and it might well be agreed to, that this ark was to Israel, sacred indeed! It was called the ark of the testimony, and of the covenant; and "the ark whose name is called by the name of the God of Israel that dwelleth between the cherubim," they whose attitude is adoration and admiration. To me, this ark is representative of him who kept the law, as did the ark; who was holy, as was the ark; and this I think is well shown by the action of Jehovah at its removal, and its resting in the house of Obed-Edom. And without desire to create and associate with this, I proceed to further consider our subject. The symbols of the Old Testament are very many, and examples are not wanting, and where ingenuity takes the lead of the minds of those who have made a speciality of this branch of study, it is both amusing and astonishing how much has been made out of them! I do not know a more expressive, clear and demonstrable symbolic exhibit, than that of Joseph's dream; there was a very marked symbol, and the outcome corresponded with great minutia. Always keep before you, in the study of symbolic language that "agents represent agents, and acts represent acts." Notice—"And behold the sun, and the moon, and the eleven stars made obeisance to me." All I can possibly make out of this is the comprehensiveness of the agents here presented, and if instead of eleven stars, only three were employed, the point would be as plain to me. Much has been made out of the parable of Lazarus and the five brethren, and I think to little purpose. One word as to symbolic prophecy; and we have this most certainly in Ezekiel's vision. The two sticks. The hair. The measurement of Jerusalem. The valley of dry bones. A symbol then, is a representative agent, whether it be horse, rider, fire, sword or whatever else! Take away the symbols of the Bible and the suggestive and instructive features of the book would be gone; the thing most needed is, that we do not become wise in our own conceits, and ignore correct principles of interpretation, and thereby make confusion more confounded! I can perhaps clear this point, by showing very briefly, that the methods generally followed in interpreting symbols, lead us into inconsistencies of every kind. The calling a white horse the gospel, they bear no resemblance! We cannot reason from a horse to the gospel. Christ does not ride on the gospel, as a warrior does on a horse. What all this does mean, it is not for me here to say, even were I able to do so. Analogy is a fundamental principle, and the laws, characteristics, and marks of symbolization are few; and embodied in what I have herein stated, are the principles which can be made portable and useful. I recently read, "that were the symbolic prophecies of the Scriptures, collected into a separate Volume, they would make a book of thirty chapters, of twenty-five verses each. That is, seven hundred and fifty distinct symbols, with their counterparts; and these are embrasive of living and active agents, intelligent and unintelligent, that may be drawn from the celestial world. From the terrestrial world. Natural inanimate objects. Artificial objects. Affections, characteristics, qualities, relations, and acts.

I confess to great pleasure, in studying this interesting and instructive feature of God's holy word, and at the same time I am made desirous of avoiding that rock, on which so many have split—making the book literal where symbols exist, and vice versa! And praying that he who was seen walking in the midst of the golden candlesticks, may soon rend the heavens and come down, that his reign may commence, for the blessing of the world, by his presence and his glory. And that what in symbol remains unanswered may obtain, is the desire of your brother in hope.

GEO. W. YONKE.

Conference Report.

In accordance with the call published in THE RESTITUTION we met on the evening of Oct. 28th, and listened to a sermon by Brother W. L. Skeels on the subject of the "Past and Future of Israel."

On Saturday morning the brethren met, and after careful consideration it was unanimously resolved to organize a conference including Oregon and Washington Territory, to be known as the Northwest Conference of the Church of God.

Brother W. A. Prosser was elected President of the Conference, Brother J. W. Sutton, of Lebanon, Vice President, Brother E. E. Brooks, Treasurer, and W. W. Jaquith, Secretary.

At 11 o'clock Brother Prosser delivered a discourse upon the second coming of the Lord, showing plainly that the Lord himself shall descend from heaven; that his coming as well as his reign is to be in no mythical sense, but is to be a sober, substantial fact, only separated from us by a rapidly lessening space of time.

At a business meeting in the evening, rules were adopted governing the officers of the conference and the executive committee. The latter is to consist of the President, Vice-President and Secretary. They are to have discretionary powers in the disbursement of funds belonging to the conference, in employing and paying evangelists. They were instructed to require a report of any brother employed by them to preach the gospel, of all moneys received by him, the same to be applied in defraying the expenses of the particular mission in which it is resolved.

Attention was called to the necessity of a fund for the work, and a beginning was made by several paying to the treasurer an amount to be used for conference purposes.

Letters of recommendation as preachers of the gospel were granted to Bros. W. L. Skeels, W. A. Prosser, and W. W. Jaquith.

Letters from several brethren who were unable to attend were listened to with much interest, and their expressions of sympathy with the meeting and love for the Master, touched a responsive chord in the hearts of all who heard them. We hope to see them all at our next meeting, and without fail at the Grand Reunion.

The day closed with a sermon by Brother Prosser from the text, "In this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things." Israel's calling, blindness and restoration were prominent topics in the discourse.

The social meeting on Sunday morning was enjoyed by all as only such meetings can be enjoyed by those who have been almost or quite isolated from others holding the same faith. Such was the case with quite a number of the brethren present. Such seasons are nearer like the first meeting in the kingdom than any this side of that time. Are they not?

At 11 o'clock Brother Skeels addressed us upon the subject of baptism as an act of obedience, showing its relation to gospel truths, repentance, and remission of sins.

After a basket dinner in the school house, we had the pleasure of seeing two of our young people, Anna and Marion Skeels, arise from baptismal waters to "walk in newness of life." That they may never yield themselves to the Adversary, and finally be received by the Lord when he comes, is the prayer of all their brethren.

Brother Prosser addressed us in the afternoon, and again in the evening on the new creation and the second Adam, compared to the old creation and the first Adam, closing with an exhortation to repentance that must have awakened serious thoughts in the minds of every one present.

Such, in brief, is the report of the first general meeting, as far as known, of the Church of God in the Northwest.

There were seven different localities represented, and encouraging letters were received from seven other localities in Oregon and Washington Territory.

Requests were made for an evangelist from different places.

Taking everything into consideration we have reason to be very much encouraged at the result of this effort at unity in the Lord's work. We have the assurance from our Father that "My word shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." Our manifest duty then is to place ourselves in accord with his word if we wish to partake of the blessings promised therein. In our conferences and other meetings, therefore, if they are not as largely attended as those of other churches, we do not need to be discouraged if those who are present show that they have the Spirit of Christ, that they are acting in harmony with God's revealed plan.

Holding, as we do, that the end is near at hand, that the Lord Jesus may, at any moment, call us to come with him, ought we not, more than any other people, to be zealous in spreading the glad tidings, and untiring in our efforts to conform our lives hourly to his loving commandments?

In conclusion, we must call attention to the fact that if the good we may is to be realized the coming year, we must be able to accomplish through our contributed liberality dependent upon the amount of means at our disposal for commencing and carrying on evangelical work.

Any brother in the East, desiring to locate in the Northwest, and wishing information regarding the country will be furnished with the addresses of the members of the conference upon application to the Secretary. Yours in hope,

W. W. JAQUITH.

Conference Report.

According to announcement the Church of God in Indiana met at Plymouth, Ind., on Thursday, Nov. 10, 1887.

The following churches were represented: Macy, Argos, Plymouth, Rensselaer, Antioch, Claysville and Pierceton. A report by Elder L. E. Conner as Evangelist was heard, showing good work done in a number of localities. Brother Conner stated that not knowing the officers of the different churches of the State hindered his work very much, and a resolution was adopted requesting each church to report to the Secretary of this Conference the names of the Elders and Deacons with their P. O. address, and the number of members of their several organizations. Also that each person present go home and report this meeting at once to his society, and have his Church Clerk make the above report and send it immediately.

The Treasurer made a detailed report, showing the amount received, and the different sources, amount paid out, and balance on hand, as follows: Received $64.25; paid out $53.00; on hand $31.25.

Brother L. E. Conner was employed for one year, as Evangelist, and he will receive a letter from the Conference stating that he is our regularly appointed Evangelist. Now, brethren, Brother Conner must be supported, and all must make some little sacrifice to keep him at work. He is capable of doing much good, and it will take but little from each one, if every one will do his part. Some have pledged certain amounts for this work. Let each church take hold and gather up all they can, and send at once to our Conference Treasurer, E. K. Barnhill, Plymouth, Ind. The season of the year is just at hand when the best work can be done, so act without delay.

The ministers present were B. W. Woodward of Michigan, L. E. Conner of Macy, Ind., and J. L. Wince of Pierceton, Ind. Attentive audiences filled to overflowing our little hall at every session throughout the entire Conference time. Brother Woodward remains with us to continue the meetings for some time. Our prayer is that good may result.

A. B. UNDERWOOD, Sec.

Prepared by the committee appointed by the Indiana State Conference.

BIBLE LESSONS FOR EARNEST MEN.
DEATH OF THE BIBLE.
Lesson 18.

BAPTISM.

Leading thoughts: Death, burial, and resurrection.

Golden text: "But thanks be unto God, that, after being slaves of sin, ye are become obedient from the heart to a form of doctrine unto which ye were transferred." Rom. vi. 17, Wakefield's Version. The Revision reads: "But thanks be to God that, whereas ye were the servants of sin, ye became obedient from the heart to that form (pattern, Mar.) of teaching whereunto ye were delivered."

Conybeare and Howson render the verse: "But God be thanked that you, who were once the slaves of sin, have obeyed from your hearts the teaching whereby ye were moulded anew."

Macknight translates: "But thanks to God, that although ye were the slaves of sin, yet ye have obeyed from the heart, the mould of doctrine into which ye were delivered."

Lesson notes: Macknight says: "The original word tupos (Gr. τυπος), among other things, signifies a mould into which melted metals are poured to receive the form of the mould. The apostle represents the gospel doctrine as a mould, into which the Romans were put by their baptism, in order to their being fashioned anew. And he thanks God, that from the heart, that is, most willingly and sincerely, they had yielded to the forming efficacy of that mould of doctrine, and were made new men, both in principle and practice."

Conybeare and Howson say: "Literally, the mould of teaching into which you were transmitted. The metaphor is from the casting of metals."

Lesson for general illustration. But the eleven Disciples went into Galilee, unto the mountain where Jesus had appointed them. And when they saw him, they worshiped him: but some doubted. And Jesus came to them and spoke unto them, saying, All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth. Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you, and lo, I am with you alway (all the days, Mar.) even unto the end of the world (consummation of the age, Mar.)" R. V. Matt. xxviii. 16–20.

Question. Who authorized and commanded baptism to be administered?

Answer. Jesus Christ, the Son of God. See above and Matt. 16, 16.

Q. Is submission to this ordinance a matter of any great concern and importance?

A. Yes, if obedience to the Son of God is made a condition of final salvation. In proof read Heb. 5, 8, 9; Rev. 22, 14; Jno. 14, 15–24; 16, 10.

Q. Who, and who only, are the proper subjects of baptism?

A. Disciples who have been instructed. See lesson above, believers of the gospel. Mark 16, 16. For apostle's practice, see Acts 2, 37–42; 9, 10–19; 11, 34–48.

Q. What does the word baptism signify? Is there a definite, special act, or ceremony required? What is "the mould of doctrine?" Are the Scriptures plain as respects some all-important doctrine and its "form, mould," or symbol?

A. Our golden text, as a symbol, employs the process of moulding something into a new form out of melted metal. To accomplish this the metal to be transformed into the desired shape must be wholly placed within the transfiguring mould. What gives the metal "mould" or "form" must completely contain, or infold it on every side. It follows that the person baptized must be wholly inclosed in some medium, otherwise there is no significancy in the symbol. Inspiration makes no such mistakes. To further illustrate, let us read some Scriptures where both the "doctrine," and its symbol, are connectedly brought together, and explained. In doing this, it will be best to take both the translation and exposition from learned authors, who believed in, and practiced both pedo-baptism and sprinkling. Conybeare & Howson translate Rom. 6, 3, 4: "Have you forgotten that all of us, when we were baptized into fellowship with Christ Jesus, were baptized into fellowship with his death? With him therefore we were buried by the baptism wherein we shared his death, (when we sank beneath the waters and were raised from under them), that even as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we might walk also in newness of life." Macknight's expository translation is: "Our baptism teaches us that we have died by sin. For are ye ignorant, that so many of us as have by baptism become Christ's disciples, have been baptized into the likeness of his death, (ver. 5) have been buried under the water, as persons who, like Christ, have been killed by sin? (ver. 10.)

Parenthetical Lesson Notes.—On these last quoted Scriptures, Conybeare & Howson say: "This passage cannot be understood unless it be borne in mind that the primitive baptism was by immersion." Again they say: "St. Paul's view of the Christian life, throughout the sixth, seventh and eighth chapters, is that it consists of a death and a resurrection; the new-made Christian dies to sin, to the world, to the flesh, and to the Law; this death he undergoes at his first entrance into communion with Christ, and it is both typified and realized when he is buried beneath the baptismal waters. But no sooner is he thus dead with Christ, than he rises with him; he is made partaker of Christ's resurrection; he is united to Christ's body; he lives in Christ, and to Christ; he is no longer "in the flesh," but "in the Spirit." Life and Epistles of St. Paul, Vol. I. p. 169, 170.

Macknight says: "Buried together with him by baptism,—Christ's baptism was not the baptism of repentance; for he never committed any sin; but he submitted to be baptised, that is, to be buried under the water by John, and to be raised out of it again, as an emblem of his future death and resurrection. In like manner the baptism of believers is emblematical of their own death, burial, and resurrection." Notes in loco.

Q. Is the action, or ceremony, of baptism to be repeated by a single performance, or by a trine repetition?

A. Burial and resurrection take place but once. Once Christ died, was buried and rose again. Believers are to die but once, to be buried but once, and to rise from the grave but once. This is the doctrine, and the symbol must correspond or lose all significancy. The one that "moulds" metals into some new form does not "mould" his work over three times. Besides the Bible decides this question in positive language: "One Lord, one faith, one baptism."—see Imprimis. Eph. 4, 5.

Q. Into what relationship to God does our baptism into "the name" (Matt. 28, 19) with which the relative terms, "Father, Son and Holy Ghost," are connected, bring us?

A. That of children of God. The term which explains what is meant in coming "into a name" is "adoption." Our baptism "into the name" divine brings us into the family of God, as his children. We die to the old Adam family, are buried, and rise up to enter the household of God, and live the new life. Speaking of God, the apostle says: "For this cause I bow my knees to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named." Eph. 3, 14, 15. For adoption and sonship read Eph. 1, 5; John 1, 12; Rom. 8, 14–23; Gal. 3, 28–29; 4, 6; Rev. 21, 7; 1 John 3, 1–3.

Q. What is the present state of believers, who, after having believed the gospel, are baptised into Christ and the family of God?

A. There is to them no condemnation; Rom. 8, 1; they enjoy the forgiveness of sins; Eph. 1, 7; Acts 2, 38; 22, 16; Rom. 6, 17–22.

Conclusion. Repent of sin, believe the gospel, and be baptized, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.

Signs of God in the Flowers.

A pleasant writer tells of a Texas gentleman who became convinced of the existence of God in the following manner: One day he was walking in the woods, reading the writings of Plato. He came to the place where that great writer uses the phrase, "God geometrizes." He thought to himself, "If I could only see plan and order in God's works, I could be a believer." Just then he saw a little "Texas star" at his feet. He picked it up, and thoughtlessly began to count its petals, finding there were five. Counting the stamins, and the divisions at the base of the flower, he found five of each respectively. He then set about multiplying these three fives to see how many chances there were of a flower being brought into existence without the aid of mind, and having in it these three fives: the chances against it were one hundred and twenty-five to one. He thought that was very strange. He examined another flower and found it the same. He multiplied one hundred and twenty-five by itself to see how many chances there were against there being two flowers, each having these exact relations and numbers; he found that the chances against it were thirteen thousand six hundred and twenty-five to one. But all around him were multitudes of these little flowers. They had been growing and blooming there for years. He thought this showed the order of intelligence, and that the mind that ordained it was God. And so he shut up his book, picked up the little flower, kissed it and exclaimed: "Bloom on, little flower! Sing on, little birds! You have a God, and I have a God. The God that made these little flowers made me."

Came to Storm Lake in 1874 where he has since resided. He leaves a wife and seven children to mourn his loss. In his two years of sickness not one impatient word passed his lips. He was ready and willing to go, but thank God we mourn not as those without hope, for has not God promised that them that are his he will bring at his coming with him? ### EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "8" and reads "Jay8" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1888. "Feb" February, "Mar" March, "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jan" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

CLOCK-TICKS AND HEART-BEATS.

Threescore years and ten
Man draweth his mortal breath:
As the flower of the grass doth he fade and pass,
In the blight of the blast of death.
The moments come, and the moments part,
With silent pinions spread;
Each tick of the clock, and each throb of the heart
Is the knell of a moment dead.
Hark to the clock's light tick!
Time flies.
Hark to the heart-beats quick!
Man dies!

Threescore years and ten
That slip like grasped sands—
Too brief, too brief for selfish grief,
Too brief for folded hands:
Go forth in the might of a love sublime,
And ere thou fall as a leaf,
Thou shalt reap from the fading fields of time
A deathless harvest sheaf.
Hark to the clock's light tick:
Time flies.
Hark to the heart-beats quick!
Man dies!

THE TEN VIRGINS.—Part 1.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were foolish, and five were wise. For the foolish, when they took their lamps, took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. Now while the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. But at midnight there is a cry, Behold, the bridegroom! Come ye forth to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are going out. But the wise answered, saying, Peradventure there will not be enough for us and you: go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went away to buy, the bridegroom came: and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage feast: and the door was shut. Afterward come also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour." Matt. xxv. 1–13.

The doctrine of this parable is clearly the second coming of Christ. The Savior speaks very distinctly of his coming in the latter part of chap. xxiv., and in verse 1 of chap. xxv., connects this parable with it by the word Then. "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins." That is, at the period referred to, the condition of things will exist among the people,—most probably the Jewish people though they may include some others,—which is so graphically set forth by the principles of the parable. It is an error to suppose that by the truth here illustrated, is intended the condition of the professing Church, and that this will be its condition till the coming of the Lord, to which reference is made, and which though at hand, is yet in the future. We do not question for a moment but some parts of the parable are illustrative of the professing church, both past and present, and as it will continue down to the end; but the location of the parable is not the period of the church, and therefore, it is not the condition of the church that is here primarily represented. That this cannot apply to the period of the church, is made clear by the fact that the ten virgins "went forth to meet the bridegroom." The virgins and the bridegroom met on the way. But the period of the church is the period of Christ being seated on the right hand of the Father in heaven. It cannot, therefore, be said that those represented by the virgins go forth to meet Christ; for he has not yet come down to the earth, and the announcement of his coming is not yet proclaimed; for that coming is a coming with his bride to Mount Zion after the first resurrection, and will probably be by way of Edom and Bosrah. The word "then" emphasizes the time, the particular period referred to, which is the open coming of the Son of Man, as we shall presently show. Hence it is a great mistake to apply this to any thing in the past or the present. To consider that time as having commenced in the past, as some teach, is, indeed, dangerous error. It is so plain a departure from Scripture teaching, that we think man must be under a strong delusion of the evil one before they can embrace such a view. Yet this view is received and promulgated. We remember when in America some years ago seeing this view advocated in one of the religious papers we read. And right along for many years this view has continued to find advocates. And recently, in an address delivered "to the preachers composing the Second Advent Conference of Southern Georgia," the speaker, John A. Cargile, declared it as his belief that they were then "sounding the midnight cry of the ten virgins." And he further declared his belief, in a very solemn manner, "that the first cry of the virgins started with Mr. Irving in Asia in 1818, Mr. Wolfe in London in 1820, and Mr. Miller in America in 1840." Now it is not a want of charity but faithfulness to truth, which compels us to say that such belief can only result from ignorance of Scripture analogy and the laws of language. We affirm that the midnight cry has not yet been sounded, and when it is sounded, it is not the cry of the virgins. How a leading preacher and an author can blunder so strangely, we cannot conceive. The cry is not from the virgins, but is addressed to them in order to awake them from their slumbers. Both the time of this warning and the cry itself are yet future, which we shall make plain as we proceed.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins." The meaning of this is, that the kingdom of heaven shall resemble, in its inauguration, or setting up, the ceremony of marriage, and the presence of guests, or friends, who are invited to sit down with the bridegroom and the bride at the wedding supper. No relation in this life is so binding, so lasting, so close, so sweet, so blessed as that of marriage; and hence it is used to set forth the closeness and blessedness of union between Christ and those chosen to be co-heirs with him in the Theocratic rule.

Now the Jews, to whom this parable was spoken, were well acquainted with the Eastern marriage custom, from which the parable is drawn. The ceremony was attended with a good deal of show and solemnity, a number of friends being present belonging to the bridegroom and the bride. "After the ceremony of marriage," we are informed by Albert Barnes, "succeeded a feast of seventy days if the bride was a virgin, or three days if she was a widow. This feast was celebrated in her father's house. At the end of that time the bridegroom conducted the bride, with great pomp and splendor, to his own home. This was done in the evening, or at night, Jer. vii. 34; xxv. 10; xxxiii. 11. Many friends and relatives of the parties attended them, and besides those who went with them from the house of the bride, there was another company that came out from the house of the bridegroom to meet them, and welcome them. These are the virgins mentioned in the parable. Not knowing precisely the time when the procession would come, they probably went out early, and waited by the way till they should see indications of its approach." When the two companies met, and the whole procession, now enlarged, reached the bridegroom's house, there was another feast. This also was called the marriage feast, as it was included in the marriage ceremony, or forms of civility.

Now it is very important to remark here—for there has been a great misunderstanding of this parable through not observing the point we wish to make—that this going forth of the virgins is not to the marriage, but to the marriage feast, after the marriage itself has been performed. This is not seen in the authorized version, but is made plain in the Revised Version; and, indeed, prior to the publication of the latter, was pointed out by scholars, as by Dean Alford, in his comments on the passage, and by Albert Barnes, in his Notes. It is designed to point to the marriage supper of the Lamb, after the marriage ceremony has taken place between Christ and his faithful people,—the resurrected and the translated saints. This going forth, therefore, must be located, not at the first stage of the great Bridegroom's appearing in the air, but when he appears with his holy ones who constitute the bride. The virgins, therefore, represent a class who will be left after the secret parousia. Almost all expositors regard the parable as setting forth the condition of the church at the coming of the Bridegroom. But this is a mistake. The church proper, the true church, or the faithful ones in the professing church will then have been gathered, or caught up to meet the Lord in the air; but it may be used to illustrate, in some points, the condition of the professing church after the removal of the elect race. We think the designed reference is to some of the Jewish nation when he appears with his saints. It illustrates their attitude at the open manifestation. And it must be so interpreted in order to accord with other portions of the prophetic word. Besides, the number ten—ten virgins—is strictly Jewish. Dean Alford says, "Ten was a favorite number with the Jews—ten men formed a congregation in a synagogue. In a passage from Rabbi Salomo, cited by Wetstein, he mentions ten lamps or torches as the usual number in marriage processions." In Luke xix. 13, we read concerning the nobleman who went into a far country, "And he called ten servants of his, and gave them ten pounds, and said unto them, Trade ye herewith till I come." The Jews then regarded this number with favor.

Several reasons may be given to show that the parable does not harmonize with the first stage of the Lord's coming. When the Lord comes for his chosen ones, there is no procession with lighted torches such as is referred to in the parable. When he comes for his elect, there is a sense in which he will come as a thief, secretly, and at the particular moment unexpectedly; but in the parable, the bridegroom's coming is announced, and the virgins go to meet him. There is nothing secret about it. At his coming in the clouds, he comes that his elect and chosen ones may be joined to him in marriage; but the coming of the bridegroom in the parable is after the marriage, it is a coming to the marriage feast. At the first stage of the Lord's coming, there may be many of the elect race, pure in heart and holy in life, who, as the result of being brought up under false teaching on this subject, had not regarded his coming as imminent; but in the parable, all the virgins were expecting the coming of the bridegroom, and all went forth to meet him.

But while the parable is not illustrative of the secret parousia, it is illustrative of the open manifestation. At the open manifestation, the bridegroom and the bride are already united; the marriage ceremonial has previously taken place; and the Lamb has brought his wife arrayed in fine linen, bright and pure: so the bridegroom in the parable, after his marriage, is bringing his bride to her future home, where a feast is prepared for them and their friends. At the open manifestation a great number,—the majority probably Jews,—will profess to be his friends and go forth to meet him, hoping to secure his favor; but only those will be received whose hearts beat true towards the Lord, and who by repentance have obtained a proper attitude towards him, and the rest will be refused his favor: so in the parable, while ten virgins went forth to meet the bridegroom, with lighted lamps, only five were allowed to enter with the bridegroom to the marriage feast, because the others appeared with their lamps going out, and no oil to replenish them, which evidenced a degree of carelessness and a lack of full preparation. They went away to procure more, but the delay prevented them from entering with their companions, for on their return the door was shut.

One idea made prominent in this parable, and the solemnity and importance of which should be pressed, and which may be used to illustrate the condition of many at the open revelation of Christ, is, the readiness of some of the virgins, and the unreadiness of others. It is a sad thought that this will be the actual condition of multitudes in the midnight of this age, and just before the Millennial era will dawn upon the world. This thought should stir us up to self-examination; for should the first stage of his coming take place while we are yet alive, and we are not accounted worthy to share in the translation of the saints, we shall be left behind, and some of us may be spared to witness the revelation of Christ in power and glory and judgment.

The inquiry should be raised by every one, Am I ready to meet the Lord? Is the light of truth shining, and the fire of love burning, in my heart? Am I prepared to join those who will be raised up to meet the Lord in the air?

To make sure of being ready for the Lord's coming, you must get ready now, and you must keep in a state of readiness every hour until the very hour of his coming is present with us. This thought is of the first importance. Allow yourself one hour's indifference, one hour's frivolity, one hour's unwatchfulness, one hour's prayerlessness, one hour's unpreparedness, and that may be the very hour of the Master's parousia. Who will dare to run such a terrible risk?

Another point not to be overlooked, but upon which only a word is necessary, is that illustrated in the parable, that the bride of Christ form one company, and the guests, or those bidden to the marriage supper, another company; just as in the parable the bridegroom and the bride are one party, and the virgins who went to meet them, and accompany them to their home, and rejoice with them on the happy feast, and partake of the wedding supper, are another party. There will be in the great future more than one company of the saved, and one will occupy a much higher position than others.

A SEA SHELL'S STORY.

A mystery of the sea has been revealed by the finding on the beach at Half-Moon Bay, a few miles south of Golden Gate, a large abalone shell bearing in mother of pearl a perfect impression of a baby shoe. The story, though stranger than fiction, is verified by such a mass of evidence, that its truth cannot be doubted. Twenty-six years ago a little girl wandered from its home on the shore of Half-Moon Bay and was not seen until four days afterward, when its dead body was cast up by the waves which break over the adjacent reef. The child was supposed to have fallen from a rock. One of its feet was gone, but this was ascribed to the voracity of a shark or other flesh-eating sea monster. Years passed by and the event was almost forgotten. Recently one of the sons of the old lady and mother of the lost girl picked up on the beach a piece of a large abalone shell which had been thrown up by the tide. He was astonished to find inside the shell a perfect representation of a child's shoe, even to the little break in the toe where the leather had worn away. Every detail was reproduced in brilliant colors which are characteristic of the interior of the abalone scells. The young man carried the shell home as a curiosity. The first person to whom he showed it was his mother. No sooner did the old lady see it than she exclaimed: "It is my baby's shoe, the shoe of my little girl that was lost twenty-six years ago." The rest of the family ridiculed the idea, but she produced the mate to the shoe. A careful comparison showed that the time-incrusted shoe in the shell and the moments of the dead child carefully kept by the loving mother through the years that she had mourned her little one were undoubtedly mates. The mystery of the child's death was revealed at last. Any one who knows the nature and habits of the abalone can readily understand what occurred. The little one had ventured out on the rocky reef, had slipped from the rocks, and her foot had caught between the rock and the edge of a huge abalone shell. At once it closed on the ankle and the little one was a prisoner, to be held until the rising tide swept over her. Such deaths are not unknown.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

THE COMING AGE,

—IN—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WESTHEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar notions, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

TWO WRONGS NEVER MADE ONE RIGHT.

Some things are questionable, and others are beyond question; they are self-evident! But says one, why is it, if the Scriptures are from God, and with him is no variableness or shadow of turning, why is it that there is so great want of harmony amongst those who take these Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice?

These questionings are decidedly easier offered than answered; and all will agree with me in this!

I dare not, with the knowledge I have of very many, call in question the honesty of heart, and perfect purpose of life of such. I have heard it said, and with a good show of force—"Here are three of us, each holding differing views as to the future state of the dead, and specially as to the 'wicked' dead; we are all agreed as to the present condition of the dead, that the good, bad and indifferent are all alike dead, and when we say 'dead' we mean wholly unconscious; now we three, differing as we do, cannot all be right; two must be wrong!"

The "show of force" however fails, when we consider who the three are! for, they all may be wrong in part, and only right in part! Well say some, is it so that we are left to drift, having no certain anchorage? No! most certainly not! Well, seeing there is such differings, who or what shall decide?

To me it seems plain, and beyond question as to the final disposal of those termed "wicked"—having none of the life which Christ gives to his followers, these must perish, as our Lord has said—"I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish"—again his reference to those on whom the tower of Siloam fell, "Unless ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." The difficulty presenting itself to the minds of many is—as to the time and mode of disposal.

Let us hear the Teacher, for we are told to "Hear ye him," Matt. xxv. 4. "Then shall he also say unto them on the left hand—depart from me ye cursed"—the "then" is manifestly "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory." The manner of their disposal will be as expressed in 2 Thess. i. 8, 9, 10, "Eternal destruction from the face of the Lord, and from the glory of his might, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints."

On those testimonies there should not be a dissenting voice!

Having been brought into relations of close intimacy with those holding opposing views on the question, what is my line of duty—shall I cease to associate, and brand as heretics all who do not see as I see, or shall I grant them that claimed by myself, viz., the charity that thinketh no evil, is not easily puffed up?

Right here let me say—I feel a deeper interest in the dying than in the dead, inasmuch as "the dead know not anything"—and therefore, for many years I have given what is called the future condition of the dead (wicked dead), a wide birth in my theology! Not because I was undesirous of knowing the truth concerning these, but knowing the contrariety of existing belief, I have much preferred to present the Lord Christ as the hope of the dying, than dwell upon the dark side of the last things.

I have an unchanged belief in the final condition of the righteous as well as also the wicked; and this after 30 experience—valuable to me—of over thirty-seven years! God's gift of life everlasting is obtainable to all who believe into the Lord Jesus Christ, and here I stop not to amplify as to "belief." God's punishment for sin and transgression is the loss of that everlasting life found only in the blessed Son of God—"He that hath the Son hath the life—he that hath not the Son hath not the life."

I have lived to see those whose life and demeanor, education and purpose, has been the most exemplary, who at a certain part of their lives have written and contended both in public and in private, for a view of the final destiny of the wicked being that of no future life after the one now held is let go of. I have seen such, and they are not a few, take strange departures therefrom, and so strange, as to advocate the re-vivifying of the entire race of man either to eternal life, or a probationary condition, where, under favoring environments those who have not known God, or been known of him may, if they will submit their wills to the Will of him who judgeth righteously. These so believing, claim that matters are out of joint now, and sufficient evidence has not been adduced to lead men to Christ now, as shall be then!

I have stood and looked on; I will not say unmoved. No, I have been greatly moved, and had I not the settled belief, that however men have looked upon these questions, and made them tests of Christian fellowship, etc., that the Judge of all the earth would do right. I really believe had I not this settled belief, I too, with many others would have let go my hold on him who is the Arm of the Lord. Thank God "The Lord knoweth them that are his."

The course then that I have pursued I shall continue in, until such a blaze of light shall assure me beyond question of a more excellent way.

"Interpretation" has been the bane of the professed follower of Jesus Christ, and desperate efforts to "harmonize" has too often been the outgrowth of the following of some man or men, who, claiming superiority in knowledge and attainments, have thereby established a school of thought, not wanting in followers!

The orthodox (?) church of today is far from what it was only a few years ago, on the question of retributive justice, and now, the old methods of scare of eternal existence in a hell of fire and brimstone is, I am happy in knowing, a belief of the past—and past I believe without hope of resurrection.

The growing tendency, yea even to, expression, from exalted stations is that of the "Larger Hope," and this view is quite taking with not a few! I do not wonder at this, as seems natural in man to go from one extreme to another.

I have no purpose in what I am offering, to discuss at length, or go over ground well worn and with which we are well acquainted; but, if possible, offer a reasonable plea, in view of the widespread differences why we should not sink, so deep these, and combine with full purpose of heart, to exalt him who has been lifted up, as was the brazen serpent.

There there are, who live in very circumscribed quarters; they are shut out from much that is going on all around them, they can only see so much as their limitations permit, and therefore it is not strange should they never be able to tell of a sunset or sunrise view! such are to be pitied, not blamed! There are others who have voluntarily set bounds to their vision, by the erection of high walls beyond which they are determined never to see—this is their creed! such are not to be pitied but to be blamed! There are those who are constitutionally affected in their organs of vision, and certainly they are not to be blamed, should they not be able to tell you from actual observation, of all the glories of the rainbow, and describe the properties that inhere in light.

There are those, who have seen a great light in the person and character of Jesus the Anointed; they have confessed—by sight—that he was a Teacher sent from God, and a revealer of the character of God; they have seen that the life in Christ was communicable, even as in his case it was derived; and yet, strange to say, such are today unwilling to get out and see the sunrise and sunset, get out from behind their high walls of creed and formulas use the eyesalve which is God given, that they may see indeed!

To all such I must say—Show your hands! buckle on the sword of the Spirit; go forth in the power of the Holy One; and leave your creeds the other side of the bridge, and burn the bridge behind you!

Do not allow the question of the future of wicked men or women to stand in the way! The call is, to "Follow me." Had Paul in his call have stopped, and enquired of his Lord—First, What is man; next what are the promises; next, what about the inheritance; and next what about the state of the dead, baptism, the Supper, and as a last question—What about the wicked dead? I question if he would not have formed one or two more questions after that: as—What about the devil—and the antichrist? No! his only query was "Who art thou Lord?" and his answer was complete.

So, dear brethren and sisters, who are such because you love the Lord Jesus; it seems to me if we have enquired diligently of the Lord, and have found out who and what he is, we shall not tarry by the way asking questions, but having been commissioned from the Lord, we will not hesitate to sound out the glorious gospel of life from the dead now, and also as a future work of him into whose hands all flesh has been given, and that whatsoever has been given him he also may give eternal life to if they truly know God, and Jesus Christ whom he sent.

OLIO. W. YOUNG.

Dear Restitution:

I want to whisper in the ears of the sister readers who peruse your columns, a few words. It is for Christ's sweet sake I would plead. I have been thinking so much of late about plans for working for our coming king. Cannot we do something, personally, I mean, sacrifice a ribbon, or a flower, or a cherished bit of decoration for our homes, to promote the good of our Savior's cause. How sweet such a sacrifice would be in the eyes of our Heavenly Father! Did you ever reflect that through the spirit of sacrifice we are to obtain the rich blessings of the future. The willingness of Abraham to sacrifice his only son for an offering unto the Lord just because he was commanded to do so; through that obedience the world is to be blessed. Oh, then, what a spirit of sacrifice should govern our lives. When tempted to indulge our tastes for agreeable and pleasing objects, let us, also, say, Nay, I do not really need that; I can get along a while longer with my old hat or my faded old-fashioned gown. Better a thousand times I should be looked down upon as the world looks down upon the humbly clad, than that I should miss wearing the robe of righteousness, should walk naked in the eyes of him who is pleased with the adornment of a meek and quiet spirit. No earthly wealth can purchase for me that robe of purity bought by the precious blood of Christ.

O, God, give us this spirit of self-sacrifice! O, teach us, if it must come through tribulations of every kind, to give ourselves to thee. Meager and poor and worthless seem the costliest of earth's treasures compared to the beauty and loveliness of a life devoted to Christ and his cause. Such an one walks in heavenly places, beside still waters and in green vales; the smile of the dear Lord is his perpetual sunlight. With such an one a royal heavenly guest comes in to sup. What moments of inexpressible joy are those visits; and so with my poor, faulty pen, (Oh, so faulty it seems when advocating such a theme,) I would gather to my heart all the dear ones of his heavenly household and ask you to renew your allegiance to his cause.

Does thine eye offend thee, pluck it out. Does it cover beautiful articles to adorn your persons or your homes, pluck it out, dear sisters, and put in its stead the eye that only sees Christ and is single to his glory. Dear Marys and Marthas, if you do this, untold visions of beauty and splendor will be visible to your mental visions, more desirable and to be longed for than the richest emporium of fashion could produce though it brought to its aid all that earth can give. But you say God has given me this spirit of loving beauty and should I not indulge it? Yes, dear ones, God has given us this desire, for does he not tell of the rainbow-hued throne, the streets of gold and walls of precious stones, to draw our hearts thither? But he also says that the cross comes before the crown, the humiliation before the glory. Even his only begotten Son was not spared, but he endured all for the sake of the joy set before him. I know that his ineffable grace saves us, but that unspeakable grace demands our life, our all, and then if having done all we may be able to stand before him or to creep up near to the throne that we may behold his glory, shall we not be satisfied? In Christian love,

ALICE J. KERR.

Dear Restitution:

We wish through your very interesting paper to refer to a few very valuable texts of Scripture, which the Indiana Committee on Bible Lessons may have overlooked in connection with lesson 2nd, on Repentance.

John (the Baptist) came preaching and saying, Matt. iii. Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bring forth therefore fruits worthy for repentance, Matt. iii. 7, 8, for by their fruits ye shall know them, Matt. vii. Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. Matt. xxi. 4. The ax is laid unto the root of the trees: therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire, Matt. iii. 10. And the people asked him, saying, what shall we do then? John answering said, he that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath food let him do likewise, Luke iii. 10. One come and said unto him, Good Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life? Jesus said, if thou will enter into life, keep the commandments. Love thy neighbor as thyself. The young man said, all these things have I kept from my youth up, what lack I yet? Jesus said, if thou will be perfect go and sell what you have and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasures in heaven: and come and follow me. Matt. xix. But he went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions. Then said Jesus, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God. When his disciples heard it . . . they were astonished . . . be saved. . . . Then Peter said, Behold we have forsaken all, and followed Thee, what shall we have therefore? Jesus said, every one that hath forsaken houses, brethren, sisters, fathers, mothers, wife, children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive a hundred fold, and shall inherit everlasting life. Matt. xix.

Then Peter said unto them, Repent, Acts ii. 38. And with many other words did he testify and exhort, saying save yourselves from this sinful generation. And all that believed were together, and had all things common, and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every one had need. Acts ii. 44, 45. Repent ye therefore and be converted that your sins may be blotted out. Acts iii, 19. And bring forth fruits worthy of repentance. And the multitude of those that believed were of one heart, and of one soul; neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own, but they had all things common. Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them and brought the price of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet; and distribution was made unto every one according as they had need, Acts iv. 32 to end. By their fruits ye shall know them. Matt. vii. 20. But Ananias and Sapphira his wife sold a possession and kept back part of the price, and brought only a part to the apostles. But Peter gives them a sharp reproof for their hypocrisy (for by their fruits ye shall know them). When they fell dead it causes fear to come upon as many as heard these things. And believers (who sold all that they had as Christ had commanded and gave to the poor) were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women. Acts v. 1-15. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Matt. xxv. 34. For I was hungry, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger and ye took me in, naked and ye clothed me, I was sick and ye visited me, I was in prison, and ye visited me.

Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me, Matt. xxv. Not by their fruits ye shall know them. Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Matt. vii. 20, 21, 22. Bring forth fruits worthy of repentance. Matt. iii. 7. For by their fruits ye shall know them.

Present Condition of Affairs in the City of Jerusalem.

T. F. Wright, who has returned from Jerusalem recently, talks interestingly with an Advertiser representative in regard to the condition of affairs there at the present time. In response to questions by the reporter, Mr. Wright said:

"The state of religion in Jerusalem is very interesting. I remained five weeks in the city and was brought into contact with persons of every class. It must be confessed that Christianity is seen at its worst there, and Mohammedanism at its best. The Mohammedan, in the early morning, hears the cry—"God is great, prayer is better than sleep"—arises, prepares himself, puts on his white outer garment and goes up into the Mosque grounds where Solomon's Temple formerly stood, and there goes through with his devotions, bowing down before God and asking that he may be guided through the day. This means to him that he must be strictly temperate, truthful in every statement, kind to all men and that he will in no case bow down to any idol. In all Mohammedan lands, idols, images and pictures are utterly excluded. The single exception to this rule is an equestrian statute of Mehamet Ali in the great square of Alexandria in Egypt; and the erection of this statute was strongly opposed, on the grounds that it might become, to some of the people, an object of worship.

CHRISTIANS' SECTARIAN CONFLICT.

"The Christians in Jerusalem are in a state of bitter sectarian conflict. They are not agreed among themselves as to the sacred sites, and they have taken sides and fought. Bloodshed is going together in the veneration of some of the Christian festivals. In the Cave of the Nativity at Bethlehem, where a silver star in the pavement marks the place where our Lord is believed to have been born, a Mohammedan soldier of the Turkish army stands always with loaded musket to keep the Christian worshipers from slaying each other. In the church of the Holy Sepulchre, in Jerusalem, the traveller notices at once a group of Turkish officials who have no interest in the place and spend their time smoking, and drinking coffee and chatting with each other, but whose presence is needed to keep the monks from actual warfare. At the time of Easter, the Turkish guards are increased to a whole regiment, so that it is difficult to make one's way through them to reach the interior of the church. In the church the Latin Franciscans alternate with the Greek monks in the performance of masses, and sometimes simultaneous masses are performed by priests standing within a few feet of each other. The lamps with which the shrines are decorated, have been apportioned to the different bodies—Latin, Greek, Armenian and Coptic—so that they may not come into conflict in lighting the place. The greatest and most unpleasant excitement is reached at the time of the descending of the holy fire, which is believed by the more ignorant to descend from heaven, and to be received by a priest. It always arrives at a certain hour or a certain day, and its arrival is waited for by a crowd which surrounds the place, waiting for many hours. When received, every one present seeks to light his candle in the flame; and runners immediately set forth to every part of the land, seeking to obtain the prizes which are offered to those who first arrive at the outlying villages.

"The bells on the church of the Holy Sepulchre and on the Mount of Olives are rung by the rival sects, apparently only for the purpose of expressing their unkind feelings. They never sound in harmony; they never ring a chime, although they are fitted to do so, but they continually raise in the ears of the contemptuous Mohammedan their unpleasant sounds.

"The English church has, by an arrangement with the American mission, the sole charge of the missions in Jerusalem. This would seem to be a mistake, for the church of England affiliates very closely with the Greek church. The bishop lately consecrated for Jerusalem has entered into a public allegiance with the Greek patriarch; and this, in the eyes of the non-Christian people of Palestine, has very greatly diminished his influence for good. In a school for the children, kept by one of the missions, an article of wearing apparel was lost, and every scholar in the school received a severe flogging in consequence—a mode of dealing with the children which is utterly abhorrent both to the Jew and to the Mohammedan, who have great love for their children, and who bring them up with little or no use of the rod.

"There is in Jerusalem, at the present time, a remarkable American colony which it was my privilege carefully to examine. About 20 persons arrived in Jerusalem in the year 1881, having gone mostly from the city of Chicago, where some of their number had been active Christian workers under Moody, and where they had been led to think that they could do more good by going to the Holy Land. On their way out, they received some accessions from England. Among their number is Mr. H. J. Spafford, once a leading Chicago lawyer; another, Capt. Sylvester, was formerly of the English army; another was a clergyman of the Church of England, who visited the Holy Land in company with the late Gen. Gordon, and who decided to remain with these people; another is a venerable lady, the widow of a colonel of the United States regular army. All are most deeply interested in their work, and share and have a common purse, and have now become known far and wide through the region, because they make no professions of faith, but simply acknowledge their allegiance to the Christ, and express by constant deeds their desire to live their religion in themselves.

"They have arrived at the time an interesting migration of Jews had just taken place from Arabia. About 300 Jews,—called Temanites, and believed by themselves to be a remnant of the tribe of God,—had moved from the desert in which the tribe long had its home, and had come to the Holy Land. They are small in stature, delicate in features, wholly free from the money-changing disposition, grateful for every kindness and eminently childlike in their characters. They were lying, when the Americans arrived, in the fields outside of the city, with no one to care for them. The Americans immediately began to prepare daily rations of soup for them, to tend the sick and in every way to watch over them according to their ability. At the present time the Temanites have established themselves in a prosperous colony south of the village of Siloam, and in their synagogue every week they have a prayer in which Horatio Spafford and his friends are mentioned, and the divine blessing is invoked upon them for their many good deeds. The house of these Americans is daily visited by persons coming from all parts of the land, to inquire into this wonderful phenomenon. The Bedouins of the desert lean their tall spears against the wall, and are cordially welcomed, and occupy a room in the house as long as they desire to remain, and the Americans, going fearlessly across the Jordan, have returned these visits and been received with the utmost kindness, and have had an influence over the lives of the Bedouins. They deal especially with the Adwan tribe, long known to be the fiercest class east of the Jordan. The Fellahin, or peasant class of the country, find always here a cordial welcome. No evening passes without seeing his company of poor and rich, of peasants and Turkish effendis gathered in the Salon, to listen to the hymns which the Americans sweetly sing; and every one, on leaving the room, expresses his gratitude for what he has come to regard as the greatest comfort of his life. In this way, Mohammedans and all classes in Jerusalem are reached for good, and a lesson is taught us in regard to the spirit in which Christian missions should be carried on.

"While the London society for the conversion of the Jews can show no converts, or nearly none, these Christians have in their own family several Jews who have become so filled with the Christian spirit that they have gradually cast in their lot with them, and are doing the same work with the others. This influence which they exert in Jerusalem is certainly to be reckoned as promising a better future for the city. Sooner or later sectarian differences will feel the influence of this life of charity. Already the Mohammedans, including the Pasha himself, have expressed their appreciation of the deeds of the Americans, and on every hand the poor people of the land pronounce daily blessings upon their work.

"The Jews are now rapidly returning to Palestine. They are not coming, as heretofore, merely in old age to obtain a grave in the land, but they are coming with means and intelligence sufficient to change the face of the country. A school is now taught in Jerusalem in which the young Jews learn to make shoes, to make clothes, to work in wood and iron, to draw, and in every way to make themselves useful and independent citizens. It is believed that in the near future, the Jew of Palestine will not only be permitted to land at Jaffa, which is now closed to him, and to remain in the land as long as he chooses, but that he will also be found tilling the soil and practicing the various mechanical arts.

"The American missionaries of the Presbyterian church in Syria, with their headquarters in Beyrout, have accomplished wonders in comparison with what has been done by their English brethren in Palestine. A large printing office now exists, books and periodicals are published, many mission stations have been established throughout the whole Lebanon district, the college is in a flourishing condition, the graduates of its medical department are found all over the East, and a theological school has lately been established for the training of native preachers. A new department of the university, likely to be very useful indeed, is the archæological department, which it is intended shall give to young ministers who go to spend a year in the Holy Land, such practical information in archæology as comes from viewing ruins and inscriptions in their own places, and from travelling over the land itself. It is greatly to be hoped that this department will receive full recognition on this side of the water, and that the archæologists of the future will receive their training, so far as Bible subjects are concerned, in the land itself, from the very competent corps of instructors connected with the Syrian College at Beyrout."

"In regard to the site of Calvary, it is wise to suspend judgment. The traditional site may yet be vindicated, and the now generally accepted site over Jeremiah's grotto may yet be rejected. The present wall of Jerusalem is modern, and it is possible that it is not built on the line of any one of its predecessors. The foundation of a previous wall has lately been found near the Jaffa gate, and outside of the present one. Excavations are not permitted except for building purposes, and therefore no systematic study of the subject can be made at present. Pending scientific investigations, the decisions made by Lieut. Conder and others on probabilities are to be received with caution. There are several places near the city which may present a reasonable claim."

One of the greatest mistakes in Church finance is to underrate the value of systematic giving of small sums by persons who are not able to give much. The feeling that it is useless to give because one's gift must needs be small is discouraged by the systematic neglect of such persons by those in charge of subscription papers and offerings. Every individual should feel that it is a privilege to give something for church work, and those who have charge of the finances of the congregation should take all pains to give every one the opportunity. It should be the ideal in every parish and mission that every communicant give something in a systematic way. There can be no doubt that the gifts of the poor are greatly blessed; for the same Lord who noted the widow's gift of all her little living still watches by the treasury of his Church. Let us take humbly and gratefully the gifts of the poor. And where these are systematically collected the volume of the offerings of the congregation is always increased.

WE have obtained the last work written by H. Grattan Guinness, F. R. G. S., entitled, "Romanism and the Reformation, from the Standpoint of Prophesy." Like his two preceding volumes, "The Approaching End of the Age," and "Light for the Last Days," it is a book demonstrating the eminent ability of its talented author, and his singular qualifications to unfold the teachings of prophesy as prediction receives its remarkable fulfilment in past history. We propose to give our readers some important extracts from this valuable work.

RAIN—BLESSING.

"My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass." Deut. xxxii. 2.

The Boschuanas inhabit a parched and arid country in South Africa. In such a land the expression explored by Ezekiel, xxxiv. 26, "Showers of blessing," has a depth of meaning entirely unknown to lands where the rains often fall to water the earth. It is said that the word PULO, in their language, means rain, and that this word is the only term they have to express blessing or blessings. All that pertains to outward enjoyment or internal happiness with them is rain. The blessings of hope, peace, joy and friendship are all alike rain. How emphatic their word pulo would become could they only know by a blessed experience the enjoyment of the religion of Christ in all its spiritual influences.

THE PRINCELY PRIESTHOOD.

"But ye are an elected race, a kingly priesthood, an holy nation, a purchased people, that ye should declare the perfections of him who hath called you from darkness into his marvellous light." 1 Peter ii. 9. Macknight's Translation.

Election is to honor and rulership. Fitness for exaltation will be the sole and, at the same time, the absolute pre-requisite for kingly crown or priestly coronal in the coming ages. Contrary to commonly received ideas, the saints are now training for future dominion. To be called out of the world into the church, in this world, is one thing; but to be chosen out of this church to the royalties of the world to come is altogether quite a different thing. How few realize what the sainthship is to which the Royalties and Priesthoods of God's everlasting kingdom will be awarded. To merely be saved is one thing, but to be glorified with Christ, and to sit with him in his throne is a very distinct matter. It is one thing to sing about crowns, and another thing altogether to win them. The prize of royalty in ages yet to be was the object of Paul's ambition, and the crown awaits him when the Lord comes. We are in the race, and the fadeless diadem is the stake.

CONDITIONAL IMMORTALITY.

The doctrine of everlasting life being attainable only through Christ is year by year receiving more careful and earnest attention. On Thursday evening Dec. 1, The Conditional Immortality Association met in the lecture-room of the Methodist Church Block, Chicago, Ill. At this meeting Rev. Joseph D. Wilson, rector of St. John's Reformed Episcopal Church, delivered a lecture on "The Awfulness of the Sinner's Doom." In this lecture he stated that, although he had formerly believed in the endless torments of the ungodly, he had embraced the belief that the end of the impenitent would be extermination of being. His view of the future was eternal life for the righteous and total extermination for the wicked. He believed that those who served God and tried to do his will would be blessed with eternal life, while those who said "O, one life is enough for me" would only have one life. It is said that the lecture was received with marked approbation by the audience.

This Association is of quite recent origin and organization. We hope it will be an efficient means of bringing out a grand and fundamental truth to the prayerful earnest consideration of the denominations of that great city. May God bless the originators and managers of this new and important enterprize.

COMING EVENTS.

In a letter to his paper, the Troy Times, the Honorable John M. Francis predicts that a European war is coming. Mr. Francis has resided in Europe for a long time and has been a careful and shrewd observer of political affairs in the old country. From Vienna he thus writes: "The political situation of Europe, is now the subject of great anxiety and not a little serious apprehension in business circles and among ministers of state. The continental nations, with the exception of Germany, are burdened with almost insupportable debt. It is all they can do to preserve credit and position with peace assured them. A great European war would involve appalling national bankruptcies, shaking the very foundations of business throughout the continent, and bringing untold distress upon millions of people. And the fact is not to be disputed that there is imminent danger of a great war of the nations here."

EMMANUEL'S LAND.

The land of promise and prophecy is a land never to be sold: "For the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me," was the declaration of the Lord to Israel. Lev. xxv. 23. By a covenant deed, ratified by the most solemn sacrifices, this land was conveyed to Abraham and his seed for an everlasting possession. Gen. xv. 18; and ch. xvii. 7, 8. This land of covenant blessing is Palestine, and the one heir Immanuel. What thrilling associations clusters around this wonderful country. O land chosen of the Lord—land of Patriarchal story—land of the pilgrimages, of the tents, and the altars of the olden times—land of angel communings, of heavenly visions, and of supernatural inspirations—land of the Psalmist and the Seer—land of Holy City and sacred Fane—land of Messiah's humiliation and sufferings, of his manger-cradle and his agonizing crucifix—land of Tabor, Gathsemane, and Olivet—of transfiguration, soul-sorrow, and heavenward ascension—land of law and gospel, of Passover and Pentecost—land of cedar and palm, of the lily and rose—of vine-clad hill and grain-waving vale—O land loved of the Lord—land that the Lord hath blessed—delectable holy land—how long shall foot of Gentile destroyer trample thy sanctuary ruins under foot? The sword of the Roman and the Crusader, the scimitar of the Persian, the Saracen, and the Ottoman, have crimsoned thy fields with rains of blood, and the blazing brand of the Pagan has kindled the flame that consumed the "holy and beautiful house" of thy magnificent temple of "holy and most holy places" to the ground. O weeping, widowed Zion, put off thy sackcloth and ashes, for the days of thy mourning are ending. Put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, for thy King returneth. Immanuel is soon coming, wearing his crown of glory, to take the throne of David, and sway the sceptre of Universal Empire. Return to the loved Fatherland, O wearied, wasted, exiles of Judah and Israel to greet the descending Messiah. Come back, O come back, Immanuel, and make the land a name and a praise to the whole earth. Let Earth hail thee King of kings, and Lord of lords.

Russian Jews' Conversion to Christianity.

Not since the days of the Apostles has the history of the Gospel conquest witnessed an episode like the Jewish-Christian movement among the Jews of the Russian province of Bessarabia, under the leadership of the learned lawyer, Joseph Rabinowitch. It is nothing more or less than the conversion of a large number of orthodox and Talmudic Israelites to the conviction that Jesus of Nazareth, whom their fathers crucified, is the Messiah promised by Moses and the prophets, and the birth and healthy growth of this conviction is not through the influence of Christian missions, but from an independent comparison of the Hebrew Scriptures with the records of Jesus' words and deeds in the New Testament. During the Russian and Roumanian persecution of the Jews in 1882, Rabinowitch went to Palestine in the interest of a colonisation scheme for his unfortunate brethren in South-Eastern Europe. While there the studies of many years ripened, and he returned with the device of "Jesus our Brother," and "The key to the Holy Land lies in the hands of our brother, Jesus." He began to preach this truth when he returned: he found ears and hearts among his fellow-Israelites in the city of Kischeuev and elsewhere; and now a constantly growing communion of Jewish Christians has been established there under his leadership.

An event of such importance naturally attracted the attention of Christian workers everywhere, and the friends of the mission cause were on the qui vive as to the outcome of a Gospel movement so unique in origin and character. Christian mission workers fortunately did not attempt to interfere with the development of the singular agitation, but on all sides the hopes, fears, and prayers of earnest Christians attended the unfolding of every new feature of the movement. Naturally its importance could not be and was not measured by the number who were courageous enough to break the fetters forged by centuries of tradition and superstition, and join in the recognition of Jesus the Messiah, but by the evangelical spirit and inner development of the faith of the new converts. In this regard the hope of the friends of the Gospel cause have been fully realized.

Four years of steady growth in knowledge and faith have settled the character of the movement as one that is thoroughly evangelical in character, however this or that minor external feature may yet seem to us not to be in harmony with a full consciousness that Jesus is the Messiah. Of the official utterances of these peculiar people but few are known to the general reader. It will, therefore, not be a work of supererogation to translate from these documents a few points showing to what a degree of Christian knowledge this Jewish Christian communion has attained.

In the Original Theses of Rabinowitch, (of which there are thirteen) adopted also by the congregation, the tenth reads as follows: "The man who unites within himself all the characteristics (i. e., those predicted of the Messiah by the Old Testament) we have, after a thorough examination of the books of the history of our people, the children of Israel, found in the one Jesus of Nazareth, who was killed at Jerusalem before the destruction of the second temple." In the "Articles of Faith of the National Jewish-Christian Congregation of the New Testament," after the various promises given to Israel are recorded in eight theses, the ninth continues: "The word of the Lord to Abraham, our father, and to Moses, our prophet, and to David, our king, and to his servants the prophets, was fulfilled and carried out about seventy years before the destruction of our second temple; for the Lord has taken pity and has exalted the horn of our salvation in the House of David, his servant, and has caused to shoot forth the righteous branch—namely, the Lord Jesus, the Christ, who has gone forth for us from Bethlehem, the city of David, in order to become the ruler of Israel; he, the mighty Son of the Most High, to whom his Father has given the throne of David—he it is who rules over the house of Jacob eternally, and his kingdom has no end. He has suffered, and has been crucified and has been buried for our salvation; he has risen again from the dead, and lives, and, behold, he sits at the right hand of our Father in heaven."

The latest official utterance of the new congregation is the "Symbol of the Congregation of Israelites of the New Covenant." This is a confession of faith, accepted and published by the congregation, of which the following paragraphs are of special interest in this connection:—

"I believe with an unwavering faith that our Father in heaven, in accordance with his promises given to our fathers, our prophets, and our king David, the son of Jesse, has raised up for Israel a Redeemer—namely, him who was born of Mary the Virgin, in the city of Bethlehem of Judea, who suffered, was crucified, died, and was buried for our salvation; who arose again from the dead and lives, and, behold, he is sitting at the right hand of our Father in heaven and will come from there to judge the circuit of the earth, the living, and the dead, and he is King over the House of David for ever, and his kingdom knows no end."

"I believe with an unwavering faith that only through faith in Jesus the Messiah any man can be justified without the work of the law, and that there is one God, who, through faith, justifies the circumcised Jews and the uncircumcised Gentiles, and that there is no difference between Jews and Greeks, servants and freemen, men and women—they are all one in Christ."

"I believe with an unwavering faith in one Holy Apostolic Church."

"I confess one baptism unto the forgiveness of sins."

The other confessions of the faith made by these people are in full agreement with these words.

The central truth of Christianity has been accepted, and is certainly under the circumstances one of the greatest Gospel victories recorded in this century of mission success. As yet the great and good work in Bessarabia is in its incipient stage; but its character and faith are more than reasonable sure guarantees that the same truth that has gained such a firm foothold will continue in its mission conquering and to conquer. The Jewish-Christian movement under Rabinowitch is a star of hope and promise that the Israel of the flesh also may after centuries of error and rebellion accept Christ the Lord as the fulfilment of the law and the prophets.—By Professor G. H. Schodde, Ph. D.

Temperance Lesson.

THE SERPENT OF THE STILL.

Harper's Weekly for October 22d contained a picture which is a powerful temperance lecture. In the background is a building on which the sign "whisky" is painted, and before it is the smoke and steam that come up from the distiller's furnaces. Out from the steam, the coils of the worm are extended into a great serpent, which is encircling in its cruel folds a helpless family. A drubby boy lies crushed to death with one of the serpent's folds around his body. A little bare-footed, lightly-clad, pleading-faced little girl clings to her mother's skirt. The mother holds a little baby with one arm while the other grasps the throat of the monster, whose coils are around her little ones, and whose forked tongue and great fangs are threatening her. Etc. The picture is thrilling and saddening, and an explanation of it is given below in the following poem, written by Will Carleton:

The tempter, as God's law sets forth—
Allowed on earth to roam—
Crushed that which woman loves so well,
Her sweet and sacred home.
From Eden, lost by his black art,
She wandered out forlorn;
She caused him in her gentle heart,
With quick but steadily scorn
And sorrow, to reveal pulse of sin,
He works his baneful will,
And reappears today within
The serpent of the still.

He comes not now in subtle mood—
With smiles as false as fair—
Enfleing her by honeyed food,
And mysteries she may know:
He makes no smiling, with advance
Into her bright home-nest,
Admitted and embraced, perchance,
By those she loves the best.
He brings the world where he must dwell,
Her days and nights to fill,
Transmuting Paradise to hell—
The serpent of the still.

He twines about her trembling life,
And coils it with his slime:
He fills the hours with foolish strife,
He sows the seed of crime.
And poverty, and fierce disease,
And hunger and disgrace,
And death by drunken quarrels,
Are in his cold embrace.
To grieve, to hurt, to rend, to strike,
To ruin and to kill,
Are laden links of his delight—
The serpent of the still.

Rouse, woman, in your quiet peace,
Your heart's soon-withering duties,
Your hand that rules the feelin' heart,
And crush the monster down!
You shape the human form and soul,
You mark the infant's way,
Youth's fabry you can still control.
Man's action you can sway:
Head every bleeding of your life
To fight its deadliest ill!
Strike—daughter, maiden, sister, wife—
The serpent of the still.

Hope and Salvation.

Did it ever occur to you what a world of thought is wrapped up in that little word "hope?" Hope is man's birthright, which, after all his blandishment, delusions and mockeries never maketh him ashamed to hope on, hope ever. Airy fancies may allure him, and smiling foes beguile him into treachery, but hope fits eternal around the head and breast, and hangs the rainbow on the blackest cloud in all the chaste sparklings of an angel from immortal life. Thunder-bolts may leap from the fair bow in the clouds, and hope may vanish as a fair scorner from that bright spot, but the fascinating form soon appears elsewhere in fairer robes than ever, and with a wreath of flowers to crown the child of endless disappointments. Now, when you connect the word "hope" with "salvation," then what a wonderful word it becomes! At once it comes to measure man's most delightful Christian attainment. Indeed, so intimately is it associated with practical godliness, that religion itself is called "a good hope through grace." More than this, our God is called the God of hope, our Savior is called Christ our hope, and his finished work is known as "the hope set before us in the gospel," while those who accept him are said "to rejoice in the hope of the glory of God."

The Millennial World Exhibition.

World exhibitions have been held in Berlin, London, Paris and New York, and as we all know are institutions of modern times, producing great national improvements, and a cosmical intercourse of nations.

The most unique world exhibition has yet to come, and is in store for the nations of the world, when Israel shall be gathered in their land of Canaan, and when Jerusalem shall be the metropolis of the whole earth. Isa. lxii. 7. lxv. 18. Jer. xxxiii. 9. "And it shall be to me a name of joy, a praise, and an honor before all the nations of the earth, which shall hear all the good that I do unto them."

To take a ramble through this wondrous scene of the future, and to bring this interesting subject into the light of present day thought will be our endeavor.

The Holy Land with Jerusalem as its metropolis will once be the object, the attraction, and the desire of all nations. Zech. xiv. It will be a curiosity to see a nation "a diversity in unity;" a people gathered from all countries, and from all lands; to look at the Israelites arrived from the Flowery Kingdom and Orient, dwelling with the opulent refined Jews migrated from Spain, England, and America, mingling themselves with the colored Jews of Ceylon and Tangier, and living in peace with the Caraite and Polish Jew. It may be called, a world exhibition of "one nation" as never before was exhibited. It will indeed afford an interesting study to become acquainted with their singular customs, usages, and diversified manner of dress, and how easy it will be for the children of Abraham to become a homogeneous people, and adapt themselves to their circumstances.

Another fact will draw the attention of the nations, namely, that the returned Jews shall possess and be acquainted with the arts and sciences, and the curiosities of ages; and how they have accumulated stores of wisdom and experience. The Chinese, Japanese and Oriental Jews knowing the secrets of China and Hindoostan, associated with the Jews of the Occident will profit of their experience in machinery, and great developments may be expected. In Agriculture, in Botany, in Horticulture and other arts, the returned Israelites will bring a wealth of knowledge and discoveries from the lands visited in their Dispora. Especially in Astronomy, Jurisprudence, Physics, and in many curious arts, in which the Jews are experts, will be subjects of the closest attention. The acute, penetrating eye, ear and cultivated mind, of thousands of Jewish Savants, having a cosmotic experience and sagacity, all drawn as it were into "a focus," must be an event worthy the attention of all civilized nations, and no doubt it will be. In Micah v. 4, is said: "And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as a dew from the Lord."

When Israel went out from Egypt, "They" asked "of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold and raiment." Exod. xii. 35, and went out loaded with gifts and wealth from the land in which they had been strangers and in bondage. We do know, as a certainty, that when Israel shall bid farewell to the nations, and depart to their own land, that they shall go loaded with "the wealth" of nations, "gold, silver and precious stones." Isa. lx. 16, 17: "Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt suck the breast of kings." And to accomplish this fact, the God of Israel has brought to light in this nineteenth century the hidden treasures of the globe, the gold mines of America and Australia, the diamond-fields of Africa and the treasures of Asia, and Israel has reaped already a golden harvest, and this is only the beginning of "the gathering," spoken of in Zech. xiv. 14; Israel must be paid and receive an equivalent for their labor of the ages past. And when returned, the "wealth" of the Gentiles and that of their kings shall be brought. Isa. lx. 11; Psa. lxxii. 10. Palestine will be the treasury vault of the earth, and consequently the nations will manifest an anxiety to see that country and come from afar.

It must be indeed a curious city and environs, where the lovers of the pagodas and Eastern minarets live together with persons who have an inclination and desire for Western architecture and Western improvements. No doubt but the East will join hands with the West, and no doubt a unity and yet a diversity will be seen in taster and enjoyments. The description of Jerusalem found in the prophets and in the revelation, directs our attention to order, beauty and glory. Hygiene will be a prominent feature in the commonwealth of Israel; temperance and cleanliness will be applied in all things; natural and spiritual laws will be observed, and architecture of course must and will occupy a prominent place among the people.

That spiritual-mindedness shall be the portion of Israel above all the nations of the earth is a fact undeniable. In Rom. xi. 26, "And so all Israel shall be saved." In Heb. viii. 11 the Lord says: "For all shall know me, from the least to the greatest." In Ezek. xliii. 4-5, "The glory of the Lord came into the house, and filled the house." In Isa. xxx. 26, their light shall be "as the light of seven days." Isa. xxv. 6-7, "the veil" shall be taken away. The prediction of Christ, which we find in Matt. xxiii. 39, will then have its fulfilment, "For I say unto you, ye shall not see Me henceforth, till ye shall say: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." It is not our design, at this time, to speak about the personal return of our Lord to his throne and people. Our aim is but to speak of the intellectual and spiritual-mindedness of Israel, and their great privileges, which will at that time stimulate the nations to visit Jerusalem and Canaan; and in that connection, we point out archæology, the great revealer of secrets and the witness of the truth of Jehovah. We fondly hope that the stones and the parchments, on which the Mosaic laws were written, will be found, and every problem will be solved; and that the Hebrew-Chaldean Aramean characters yet will be seen in their originality. In the hands of Israel, the greatest linguists of all nations, the wealth of the language will shine, and the plenary inspiration will be fully acknowledged and every dark sentence in the Bible fully explained.

The return of the Jews to Palestine, and the going of the nations is not a dream, neither is it "one of the Thousand and One Arabian Nights stories;" it is an event already in accomplishment. Jerusalem with her fourteen thousand Jews can already be called a Jewish city under Moslem rule, visited from year to year by a multitude of representatives of many nations; already that land of Canaan and the City of Jerusalem have an attraction, not experienced since the times of the Crusaders.

Not only the true followers of the Lord Jesus are looking to the East—the followers of Mohammed, according to their Koran, believe that Jesus will return to Jerusalem, and call that place the Holy City. There is an idiosyncrasy among Jew, Greek, Catholic and Protestant to look upon Jerusalem as a magestic city. There is a sentiment slumbering in the mind of nations about Jerusalem that cannot be explained but by the student of prophesy; and, indeed, it cannot be denied, that the way to its fulfilment is already pro-eminently prepared. It is only seventy years ago, since the first steamboat was launched, and now, as by magic "steam engines" have shortened the distance; the telegraph has annihilated, as it may be said, time and distance. Every thing is concentrating, and drawing to one focus. Already a cosmical spirit is observed, a spirit for travel is growing rapidly, and an unrest is found in the movement of nations and people.

Shall a kind Providence provide all these means for the use of commerce and for the pleasure of sinful men, and lose sight of the future? We answer: all these great improvements of the nineteenth century are made to accelerate the great events in the kingdom of our Lord, and the return of Israel to Canaan.

Finally, we hear in John xii. 20, that Greeks desired to see Jesus. We do know that Islam has Mecca, the Roman Catholics, Rome and Loretto; that Ireland has Knock. It seems that the love of "going up to some shrine is deeply buried in the hearts of the multitude"—and who, we ask, can reasonably doubt, that the prophesy found in Zech. xiv. 16-17, shall remain unfulfilled? We emphatically declare: God shall bring to pass that great event: "That nations shall even go up from year to year to Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep the feast of Tabernacles." What a joyous time that shall be, to do homage to him, whom we love supremely; and when that glorious anthem will be sung in the most melodious voice:

Oh sing in joyful strains
In songs His truth make known;
God over all the nation reigns,
High on His holy throne.

The lords of Gentile thrones
With Abram's children meet,
The shields of earth belong to God,
Exalted in His seat.

IN REMEMBRANCE.*

We're gathered here as best we may,
To celebrate our friend's birthday
Who's lived for Jesus seventy years,
And left behind all doubts and fears.
When ten years old her heart she gave
To Jesus, trusting Him to save;
And His kind hand in spite of tears,
Has led her on to eighty years.
The lilliones so bright and fair
That added joys and brought her care,
Have grown to be a comfort now
When marks of age are on her brow:
And they too feel the blood applied
That flowed from our dear Savior's side:
While some proclaim his holy word.
All watch to see the coming Lord.
May we who gather here today,
Walk on, like her, the good old way,
And they who've known the Savior long,
Help others sing redemption's song.
Till freed from carnal doubts and fears,
We'll dwell with him through endless years.
When on her brow her crown she wears,
Think you she'll mourn these seventy years
She spent in service of the one
Whom first and brought her safely home?
Although the home's a pleasant place,
She loves to see her Savior's face,
For Jesus sure will come again,
As he has promised here to reign!
And what rejoicing there will be,
When we the king of glory see.
With all his bright, angelic train.
And meet our loved ones once again.
Redeemed, redeemed, our song shall be,
And are through all eternity.

ESTHER WARD.

*Lines written on Mother Woodward's 80th birthday. In remembrance of the day her children made her a little surprise at her home, took her an easy chair to sit in at the church, and after the dinner about fifty hymns of praise and prayer went over to the church close by and finished the day in congratulations and praise. Out of eleven children given her only three live, and all were present. It was a happy day for mother and we wish her many returns of the day.

To the Brethren Scattered Abroad:

As I have of late received some letters of enquiry relative to what I was doing, will say that I am doing about as little as I ever did, and yet I believe I have as much interest in the truth as ever, but circumstances seem to hold me back. When I left Antioch last June I visited several places but found the brethren generally too busy to attend meeting. At Eagle Creek, our old stamping ground, held several interesting meetings, also gave a few discourses at Teegarden. Left with a promise to go back, which we did in September and commenced a course of lectures. After giving four or five was called home where I have been ever since waiting for some of the brethren to get ready for meetings. I am ready and waiting, saying, here am I, send me. Now I had expected to go to Kansas last September, but my sickness last spring and other things prevented me from going. I would gladly go to Kansas if I had the necessary means. Now if there is anything discouraging it is to go to a place where there are brethren and speak about meetings, and they will have about a dozen excuses, such as this, "Well I am afraid we can't get out a crowd. Then we have had so much preaching here, and I don't think it will do any good." etc. Now if we would adopt the old adage, "If at first we don't succeed, try, try again," we would see more accomplished. Your brother of the one hope,

H. R. CARTER.

Dear Restitution:

Enclosed find two dollars to renew Sister Parker's subscription for 1888. Please send her the "Unspeakable Gift," by J. H. Pettingill. I am here on my way home and Sister P. wishes me to say to you that her eye sight is becoming quite dim, but she can see to read some yet, and she wants that book to read and lend to her neighbors. We are both strong in the faith yet, and though old and feeble, mean to hold on, by God's blessing, to the end. In love,

L. ADAMS.

Dear Restitution:

As my subscription has expired I am going to renew. Enclosed you will find one dollar for THE RESTITUTION. I would like to send more, but this is the best I can do now. I have no privileges here, no meetings, no friends of like precious faith to talk with. I can't think of doing without my paper as long as I can see to read it. Your unworthy sister contending for the faith once delivered to the saints.

LOIS NEWELL.

ALDEN, Iowa.

Dear Brethren and Sisters:

I write to inquire whether there are any people of like precious faith with us living in the city of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and if there are any there who read this, will they be so kind as to call at 171 South 6th St., as there is a sister living there who is trying as best she can to keep herself unspotted from the world and help others to see the truth, and is herself instructing her children, both week day and Sunday to shield them from vice and false teaching. She does not know of another of the faith in the city and never met one until she kindly lodged me in her home for a week during my stay in the city as a delegate to the State Convention of the W. C. T. U. She has never been baptised and is very anxious to find some one who will administer it for her, and wished me to say to Brother Whitecott, or any other of the preaching brethren who are passing through and can do so to stop and see her. Her name is Mrs. J. M. White. I shall send her some copies of THE RESTITUTION. Yours in the fellowship of love.

LIBBIE PALMER.

Dear Restitution:

I cannot renew my subscription now not before next summer. I have lost my dear husband. He died June 24th. Had he lived till the 28th he would have been fifty-seven. He had catarrh of the stomach and an abcess on the liver. He was sick five months, and of all that time he never complained; when he would complain I would ask him what hurt him, and he would say nothing, that he was so tired. He was a dear lover of THE RESTITUTION and a diligent reader of the Bible. He was a strong believer in the soon-coming kingdom. When he would get THE RESTITUTION and see any thing that he did not understand he would get the Bible and hunt it up and say, "That is correct." He converted himself by reading the Bible four years ago. He wanted to be baptized, but could not as there was no chance. God help him is my prayer. I have not seen a well day since my husband died. I trust to God for health and strength. My husband's name was Abner M. Tribbey; died at Lovelock, Butte Co., Cal. He leaves a wife and two little children, a grown son and a grown daughter to mourn his loss, besides a large circle of friends.

MRS. MARTHA TRIBBEY.

Dear Restitution:

I have been a reader of your paper for thirty years, and some of the old time brethren have gone clear ahead of the Bible. But I like the paper in its present phase of the blessings of Abraham in blessing the world in age to come. I believe that Christ died for the sins of the whole world. I believe the present teachings of the paper consistent with the Bible, its large print, and that is wherein I like it. I have been nearly blind for a number of years with the granulated sore eyes. Send me the paper as long as you have means and God will reward you in the kingdom.

G. W. PLUMMER.

OMAHA, Neb.

Dear Restitution:

I now write a few lines in answer to a request in your paper to send before Nov. 30th; as I suppose you are in need of money I herein send you ten dollars to renew my subscription for another year, from Jan. 1, 1888 to '89, one paper, and instead of one of three books, please send me all of them and use the balance as you think best, for the times seem to tell of something to come not long hence, we do not know how long; but we do long to see the coming of the Son of God as King to establish his kingdom on the earth and to put an end to all this worry and strife on account of a supposed tyranny on the part of some. But I suppose it some had the whole world they would not be satisfied. I for one am thankful to our Heavenly Father for the blessings he has bestowed upon us. We have no reason to complain. We have tried to do what we understood to be our duty, and have been blessed. Although we are almost alone as regards the one faith, yet we have baptised some three or four since we have been here. I think altogether there have been about sixteen brethren in Omaha, but quite a number have gone away to other parts; we are still holding to the faith wishing that some brethren would give us a call who would give some lectures on the gospel of the kingdom, or in other words that would preach the gospel of salvation to a lost and fallen people. If any such brethren should pass through Omaha, we would like them to find us out. We live near the Fort called Fort Omaha. I remain yours in hope of eternal life through the gospel.

JASON ELTON.

OSAWKEE, Kan.

Dear Restitution:

I thought I would comply with your request, and will therefore send you two dollars for another year's subscription. Also have secured another trial subscriber for three months. I would like all the books but prefer the Christian Hymnal. Times are very stringent here at present, and this is the best I can do now. We would like to have preaching here of our faith, but we are only few in number and cannot well afford to send money to pay expenses, or we would have some one to come and preach for us. We have hopes that perhaps some may come through and stay with us awhile, and preach for us. We will try to entertain them as long as they will remain with us. What few are here are still firm in the one faith and still pressing forward toward the mark of the high calling and looking and waiting for the blessed Redeemer to return and set up his kingdom on this earth, which shall never be destroyed; where the righteous shall never more feel sickness or sorrow, nor pain nor death be felt nor feared more, but love, joy and peace in abundance, and to this we may say, glory to our Savior. The health in this vicinity is quite good. Living is plenty and cheap. Yours in the faith. MRS. FANNIE AIKEN.

To the Faithful in Christ, Greeting.

As we have the fore opportunity let us do good unto all men; especially to those who are of the Household of Faith. Gal. vi. 10, Noel Heb. xiii. 16.

We read in the book that our beloved Master "went about doing good." By closely observing the record of his daily doing we see that the good he did had not exclusive reference to spiritual matters. When he saw the multitude suffering from hunger, in his great goodness and by his divine power he enlarged the supply of bread and fish till he had fully satisfied the physical wants of the great multitude. When he saw the widowed mother bowed with grief over the bier of her only son he lifted the pall, and caused the sleeper to awake from death's cold slumber that he might again comfort the heart of her who mourned for him as no more. We are not told that those, and a thousand other acts of pure benevolence had reference to anything higher than relieving temporal wants and bestowing blessings circumscribed by the present life. He is our great exemplar; and in all things we should seek to follow after him, who at all times sought to do good to all, yet ever maintained as the first principle, obedience to his Father's will in all things, and next, the good to others, leaving self last if not quite out of sight. Through the tender mercy of our Father whose watch-care followed us with journeying mercies, we arrived safely in San Diego, Cal., Oct. 26. The fatigue and weariness of the journey soon passed off in this genial clime, of which the half has not been told. I will give a few statements which I have received as facts, and of which I have no doubt. Then I leave others to do according to their own judgment as to changing their present for a more westerly home. This city is situated on the Bay of San Diego, which is about a mile wide and is said to be one of the finest harbors on the coast.

The climate I believe is unsurpassed in loveliness anywhere on earth. Frost is unknown, and so also is that dry parching inland heat that in summer is so exhausting in the more eastern and northern portions of the Union. The mercury ranges between 54 and 80 degrees almost the entire year. It is just 16 miles to the Mexican line.

Today, Nov. 18th, flowers of numberless color, fragrance, and beauty adorn the gardens. Geraniums seem here to have found their native soil, I have seen them ten or twelve feet high, they bloom continuously, and are in endless variety. All the flowers, and many other varieties that in more northern climes we are accustomed to see tenderly cared for in pots, here grow and flourish in the open air. Heliotrope here is seen as a beautiful shrub from three to six feet high. Nesturtiums are very numerous and are trained up to the second story windows. Beds and beds of the pure Calla Lily greet the eye on almost every street.

Tomatoes continue growing and bearing for five years, but are most fruitful the second and third years. Orange and lemon trees are now laden with their precious fruit which is just changing from the green. Fig trees too, are showing their luscious brown fruit, also olives, dates, nectarians, and others too numerous to mention. Nothing we have found here in fruit equals the white or raisin grape. I cannot speak in terms too high of these choice delicious satisfying fruits. The season for them is about over here, though they bring some down from the mountain regions. In Oct. they were five cents a pound, now they are ten. Very many fan palm trees are seen in the yards. The base of the trunk is sometimes a foot in diameter. The principle street shade tree is the pepper. It is very beautiful in foliage, in its graceful drooping it resembles the weeping willow. The fruit (the same as the black pepper of commerce) is now hanging in abundant red clusters. They do not grow very high but are quite spreading in their branches. The Yucalypta is a tall peculiar tree with large thick shining green leaves. It grows tall and seems to shed its bark when a few years old; this gives it a rather shaggy appearance when not cared for. Here we have rose trees as well as roses. The most gorgeous shrub is the "Christmas rose." A cluster of red and yellow tiny flowers in the center, then a tier of crimson leaves, making the rose appear from 8 to 15 inches in diameter. The cypress tree here flourishes abundantly as well as numerously, we often see them trained and clipped into the most beautiful hedges. But I must withhold on these less important items and pass on to that which pertains to the more matter of fact. Two years ago San Diego had a population of about 5,000 souls. Now her citizens are variously estimated at 25,000 to 35,000, and still they come pouring in by land and water till there seems no room to contain them. All the hotels, and boarding houses are crowded to overflowing, and others are being built in all directions. You cannot I believe get out of the sound of the hammer anywhere in the entire city.

There are some very fine business houses well stocked with all that eastern markets offer for sale. As yet, there are no very costly public buildings, for the city has had such a sudden growth that there is not time as yet for their erection. The city slopes up gradually from the Bay. From some of the elegant private residences on the many beautiful elevations within the corporation, you have a most magnificent view of both land and sea, mountain and plain.

As yet the streets are not paved and for this reason dust is the all prevailing annoyance of the inhabitants. A feather duster hangs outside every door, as a rule. Prospects are that ere long the streets will be asphalted. This when done will very largely add to the comfort of the inhabitants. There are 18 church buildings and the sects not yet able to build, meet in halls or other buildings. The seventh day Adventists here number about forty. They have a plain comfortable church building in which they hold meetings and Sabbath School.

There is a well appointed public library. A fine Commercial College well conducted and well patronized. There is one particularly fine school called the "Russ School House" after the name of the donor of the site (I am told) which is a most magnificent one. A high plat of ground overlooking both land and sea for many miles around. I notice that as a rule the children look plump and rosy. The grown people of both sex as a rule seem less haggard by care and toil than in other climes. Of course there are here as in all lands, the wretched and the poor, and worst of all the slaves of opium and intoxicants. The woman of the varied churches have banded themselves together as an host to work against this hydra-headed foe under the name of the W. C. T. U. They have also organized a "Woman's Home Association" for the aid of indigent women and homeless children. To still further aid their own sex they have organized a "Woman's Exchange" where all kinds of handiwork may be disposed of for the benefit of the seller.

Labor rates higher than in Eastern cities. House girls get from $2.50 to $3.50 per week. Carpenters from $2.50 to $4 50 a day, and other grades of labor in proportion.

Provisions are I think rather higher also dry goods, and furniture is a good deal higher, and rents are enormous. Out in the suburbs of the city, houses of two to five rooms rent from $15.00 to $30.00 a month, while down town rooms in the third story bring from $10.00 to $40.00. Offices and stores are proportionally high. On this account I do not see that it is wise for persons to emigrate here who have not some means on hand, as it takes time to become established anywhere, and that time in this city at present prices, would cost a good deal of cash outlay. But to those who have a few hundreds or thousand of dollars that they wish to invest in real estate and retain enough to keep them a while till that investment increases in value, there is every variety of opportunity offered, from the full bearing orange grove or vineyard in the near surrounding country to the very centre of the business portion of the city.

The business done here in real estate is almost incredible. I am informed that there are between two and three hundred first class agencies and about seven hundred others. They all seem to be kept busy. I notice many of them drive fine horses and their names and business is seen in large white letters on their carriages. At present the city is supplied with water from the San Diego river. The water is very abundantly conducted in pipes to the various streets and houses. But there is now a better and in every way a larger system of waterworks under course of construction, viz: an immense flume is being laid down from the mountain, about thirty miles distant. This the contractors guarantee to have completed by March 27th, 1888. Coronada Beach is separated from this city by the Bay. The lower portion of the Beach which is now so great an object of interest consists of about 1100 acres of the most fertile land in the world. The altitude is from 30 to 50 feet above the sea, thus presenting one of the finest views of old ocean in the world. Within two years this entire tract was purchased by the C. Beach Co., for $120,000. They have already sold $3,000,000 worth of lots, and have now in course of erection one of the finest hotels of any land in modern times. There are several other fine hotels. Many elegant residences and cottages, as well as tents, also a church and school house on the beach. The Co. celebrated the first anniversary of their sale of lots on Nov. 12, 1887. Of course very eulogistic speeches were made on that occasion. One speaker remarked that "without a Babcock (he is the principle stock owner of the Co., and worth many millions) there would have been no Coronada." This reminded me, when I read it, of a certain great one of old whom the people eulogized saying, "It is the voice of a god." How soon their idol was dethroned. I thought how soon he who has set the bounds of the mighty deep might loose their bounds and with one tidal wave sweep the whole beach into ocean's depths. "Cease then from man whose breath is in his nostrils." In such an event how vain would be the help of man? I sometimes wonder whether all this re-discovery and this wonderful boom in this most favored of all lands has any part in the things that pertain to "the day of his preparation." The most notable feature on Coronada Beach is the grand hotel which covers 7½ acres and will require 17½ acres of carpet to cover the floors. The court in the centre is 150 by 250 feet. In the centre is a beautiful fountain which will keep in continual verdure the lovely plat surrounding it. This plat is studded with the very choicest tropical fruits and flowers loading the ocean breezes with their delightful fragrance. I cannot here describe this magnificent structure which is shortly to open its capacity of accommodations for 2000 guests. It is right on the very strand of the bold Pacific on whose restless bosom the guests from every clime may gaze with varied emotions. From the ferryboat, which crosses the bay from San Diego, there runs Orange Avenue, 140 feet wide. It is planted with orange trees 30 feet apart and between them alternate Palms and geraniums. On this avenue a steam Motor, double decker, runs every 20 minutes. It crosses the peninsula from the ferry to the hotel. The view from the upper deck of this steam car is magnificent beyond description. Ocean gleaming like a sea of glass in the glorious sunshine, while vessels from many climes and of various burdens hoist their colors to the breeze. The ranges of purple mountains bound the landed horizon and in between rises dome and castle, tower and hamlet, the work of Man's genius.

The busy throng hurry to and fro as ignorant of the times in which we live as were the Ninevites of the destruction that awaited them. Lots, and lands, real estate is the all-absorbing topic on every hand. And the real object for which life is given seems to be almost entirely lost sight of.

The Post Office is in a most deplorable condition, simply for want of sufficient help from Washington. We have not seen a RESTITUTION since Oct. 19th, nor need we hope soon to do so as there are piles and piles of papers and letters too that the overworked help in the office cannot reach. We can have no confidence either in posting or looking for letters. Therefore let not our friends complain if long silence seems to separate us. The citizens all hope for better things after Congress meets. We are happy to say we have found a few here who know the truth. Sr. Drosser, known to many of the readers of THE RESTITUTION is here, also Sr. Maria Thompson of Ill., a relative by marriage of Bro. B. Wilson. We here also found Bro. S. D. Fahrney, who has been contending for the faith for the last 20 years, and is well known to the churches of Ill. and Iowa. We hope to have a little meeting in the near future where we can at least commune with one another. All these unite with us in greeting those of like faith who are scattered abroad. Should any wish to make particular inquiries regarding this goodly land, I shall be happy to answer all such questions as soon as their letters come. Commending you all to our Father's care, your Sister in Christ.

THE PAPACY.

I here offer but a few words in illustration of a subject on which, if necessary, a volume might be written. When Paul, speaking in the singular number says that "the high priest" did thus and so (Heb. ix. 7, 25), he means no individual high priest only, but the whole succession of them during the 1500 years of the Mosaic law. Therefore, by "the man of sin" (2 Thess. ii. 3), we may well understand no individual pope only, but the whole succession of them during the 1260 years of the papal career. Even in the precise manner of the law, "the priest that standeth to minister," or, "the judge," points to a whole succession of men. Deut. xvii. 12.

Often the same symbol represents different characters, and different symbols different characteristics of the same person. Hence, there is no force in the objection that it would be incongruous to represent the same false church by a "man" and also by a "woman;" for so is the true church represented, but with this difference—that the false is a bad man or woman, and the true is a good man or woman. Ephes. ii. 15; Rom. vii. 3, 4; Rev. xvii. 4; xxi. 9. In neither case do we suppose the term "man" or "woman" to be restricted to any single individual. If it would be absurd to suppose the "woman arrayed in purple and scarlet" means a single woman, why not equally so to suppose the "man of sin" means a single man? By a single beast is often meant a realm and its entire succession of kings, and the actions ascribed to the beast are done not by any one of the rulers but by the whole succession of them in the aggregate. Dan. vii.; Rev. xvii. 7, etc.

Those writers in the 2nd and 3rd centuries who thought the antichrist or man of sin would be a single person, were more excusable for such a mistake than we; because they lived before the prophesy had developed so clearly into history as it has done since they wrote. They, looking as it were endwise at a long line of trees might be able to perceive only one tree, and that the nearest to them at the head of the line. But we, at this late day, may, by the telescope of history, glance with a clear perspective down the avenue of centuries and count, from the first pope, the whole succession of "that man of sin" with their bloody deeds and blasphemous claims. By history we can also count many successive generations of the "one new man" with whom the multitudinous man of sin has, in various ways, continually "made war." Dan. vii. 21; Rev. xiii. 7.

Tertullian, about A. D. 200, assigns it as a particular reason why Christians prayed for the Roman empire as it then was, because they knew that antichrist (of whom they seem to have had a greater dread than of the pagan emperors) would be its successor. And it was well understood and clearly affirmed in these days that by the expression "he who now letteth" (or the "one that restraineth now," R. V.), Paul meant no single emperor of pagan Rome, but a succession of them. Accordingly Bishop Newton, speaking of affairs at the beginning of the fifth century, says, "Jerome was himself a witness of the barbarian nations beginning to tear in pieces the Roman Empire, and upon this occasion exclaims, 'He who hindered is taken out of the way.'"

Now, if a succession of emperors of pagan Rome is called in the singular number "one" or "he" that restraineth, may not a succession of popes be also in the singular number called "that wicked" or "the lawless one?" 2 Thess. ii. 3, 7, 8; R. V. The phrase "one that restraineth" is, therefore, a grammatical key to its sequel "the lawless one;" and thus Paul's language is self-interpreting.

And it seems entirely reasonable and fair to say that as the one that restrained in Paul's day has long ago been "taken out of the way," so the lawless one or antichrist has long ago made his appearance, and that too in the very city where the restraining one was formerly seated. History shows too plainly for dispute what power sprang up and has held away in Rome and largely beyond, since the imperial reign over was uprooted and "taken out of the way."

I would not say, however, that the Papacy has already exhausted the characteristics of the man of sin, or the fangs and virus of the antichrist; for as the king reigning in opulent Babylon when it fell, was even more implous than his predecessors, so perhaps the reigning pope when papal Babylon falls will be worse than any yet seen.

Perhaps the culminating phase of papalism will be its heading up in the Grecian power that first rents itself in Constantinople, and thence comes against the mountains of Israel, in the latter days. Ezek. xxxviii. It was by a decretal epistle of Justinian, from this Constantinople, A. D. 533, that the Roman pope was imperially pronounced "Head of All the Holy Churches," and about seventy-five years later, by decree of Phocas, confirmed as "Universal Bishop." And if a similar ukase in favor of the pope should ever be issued from the same city of Constantinople by the Russian Autocrat, what a wide-spread power for mischief would coalesce in the united pope and czar at the closing scenes of this dispensation!

Let us "abide under the shadow of the Almighty" and pray that we may be accounted worthy to escape the fate of the wicked, and "to stand before the Son of man." Psa. xci.; Luke xxi. 36.

WILEY JONES.

MOORE.—At his home in Arkansas, Nov. 20, 1887, Milton M. Moore, aged 57 years, 10 months and 19 days.

He died after an illness of four weeks, the last week of which his suffering was intense. We have sustained a loss that deeply saddens the heart of each surviving member of the family. Death's relentless hand has deprived us of a father for whom a slight acquaintance was sure to elicit praise, and a more intimate knowledge equally sure to win not only high esteem, but sincere, loving friendship. Father was born in Park Co., Ind., Jan. 1, 1820. He united with the Christian church at the age of twenty years and was a faithful member until the winter of 1863-6 when he heard for the first time the gospel of the kingdom preached by J. F. Wagoner, at Rochester, Ind. Since that time he has been a member of the Church of God in Christ Jesus, who are looking for the consummation of the promises made to Abraham, the father of the faithful in that glorious restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. Although we are persuaded that his record is on high, and that his life is hid with Christ in God, still it was with sorrow of heart that we saw him in the casket for the last time, and with sorrow intensified that we saw that casket lowered into the grave. With grief we look upon the vacant chair, but we sorrow not as those who have no hope. We believe thy last sleep is that sweet sleep in Jesus from which none ever wake to weep. In that stilly retreat from all life's cares and sorrows rest, dear father, rest, till the trump of God shall call thee forth to the incorruptibility, immortality and glory of the life eternal, to wear the fadeless crown and enter within the pearly gates. Rest till earth's deserts become blooming paradises; till the thorn, the thistle and the brier give place to trees of life that shade the crystal river. We, the left and sorrowing ones, will toil on for the loved Redeemer a little while longer; we have parted, but we parted to meet again. When the parting skies shall reveal our Savior, we expect to meet thee in the general assembly and church of the first born ones in the Heavenly Jerusalem. Till then adieu. The deceased leaves a wife and five children to mourn the loss of a kind father and loving husband.

"HE CARETH FOR YOU."

"Casting all your cares upon him; for he careth for you." 1 Peter v. 7.

How strong and sweet my Father's care!
The word, like music in the air
Comes answering to my whispered prayer—
He cares for thee.

The thought must wonder with it brings,
My cares are all such little things,
But to the truth my glad faith clings,
He cares for me.

Yet, keep me ever in thy love,
Dear Father, watching from above,
And let me still thy mercy prove,
And care for me.

Cast me not off for all my sin,
But make me pure and true within
And teach me how thy smile to win,
Who cares for me.

O still, in summer's golden glow,
Or wintry storms of wind and snow
Love me my Father; let me know
Thy care for me.

And I will learn to cast the care
Which like a heavy load I bear
Down at thy feet in lowly prayer
And trust in thee.

For nought can hurt me, shade or shine,
Nor evil thing touch me, nor mine,
Since thou with tenderness divine,
Dost care for me.

THE TEN VIRGINS.—No. 2.

At the inauguration of the kingdom at the open manifestation, while the elect race, who will be co-rulers with the Christ, will occupy the most distinguished position, yet the Jewish people, who make themselves ready by repentance and faith, will share in the blessings of those days, and at the beginning, or are the beginning, of the Messianic reign, will be "bidden to the marriage supper of the Lamb." And those who will be bidden are pronounced blessed; it will be an occasion of exceeding great joy: so the virgins in the parable who were ready to go with the bridegroom to the marriage feast, shared in the rejoicings of the occasion.

Again: the coming of the bridegroom in the parable is at midnight. This may be illustrative of the coming of Christ at the ending of the present age. His coming, indeed, will be its consummation; then will be the separation between the tares and the wheat; then will be the destruction of his enemies.

Some writers and preachers, as we have already said, err greatly in reference to the cry at midnight, "Behold, the Bridegroom! Come ye forth to meet him." By some strange method of interpretation, and by not observing the analogy of Scripture, they insist that the midnight cry, proclaiming the Lord's coming, has been raised. If so, where are the results? In the parable, all the ten virgins, the foolish and the wise, on hearing the cry, "Behold, the bridegroom!" arose, put their lamps in order, and started off to meet and welcome and congratulate the bridegroom. Where can we find anything to correspond with this? The truth is, there is nothing to correspond with this. Even during the last half-century, while the Lord's second Advent has been made a special theme by thousands both in this country and America, nothing can be pointed out to answer to this part of the parable. We may be told that a company in America in 1843 went forth to meet the bridegroom. But that movement—based on ignorance, and if sincere, yet fanatical in the extreme—in no sense agrees with the parable. The virgins in the parable did not go forth to meet the bridegroom till some days after the marriage, when the bridegroom was returning to his own home, and bringing his bride with him. But Christ, the heavenly Bridegroom has not yet gathered his scattered and believing people who are to form his bride. And until that is done, those represented by the virgins cannot go forth to meet him; they cannot go to meet him till he is again on the earth; they cannot go up in the clouds to meet him. The virgins in the parable also waited, took their rest, till the actual presence of the bridegroom was announced; then they arose and trimmed their lamps; but the actual personal presence of the heavenly Bridegroom has not yet been announced, and will not be until after the secret parousia.

It is true we are now in the world's night; the night too is far spent; but we have not yet reached the midnight of the present age. Before midnight, before the consummation of the age, the great Bridegroom comes for his bride, his believing, faithful people who are now espoused to him, and who will be co-rulers with him in the millennial kingdom in the age to come. Then it will be said, "Let us rejoice and be exceeding glad, and let us give the glory unto him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready." And then, it is not until he is seen coming with his bride, gloriously arrayed in fine and pure linen, that the midnight cry is heard. And this cry is raised by one of the distinguished company, or perhaps by an attendant angel. The cry is not Go, but "Come ye forth to meet him," showing that the invitation proceeds from the royal company. And this invitation is a bidding of guests to the marriage feast, to participate in the wonderful rejoicings of that event. This is plainly set forth by the parable; for the cry in the parable does not come from the virgins, but from one accompanying the bridegroom and the bride, after the wedding has taken place, and they are on their way at midnight to the house of the bridegroom. On this point, Geo. N. H. Peters says very forcibly, "The midnight cry is one that arose not before the wedding, but after; not before the procession had started, but after; not before the very last period, but just when expiring." They are grossly mistaken, therefore, who think this cry has been raised by the proclamation of second Advent truth and the warning given the church and the world of the near coming of Christ; for the cry in the parable is raised by one or more in the procession following the marriage ceremony.

Another point of interest in the parable is the question sometimes raised, whether those represented by the foolish virgins will be lost. We answer, not necessarily. They may be saved; for at that judgment period an angel flying in mid-heaven will have "an eternal gospel to proclaim unto them that dwell on the earth," and if they accept, they cannot be lost. They will certainly be excluded from the marriage feast; they will lose much that they might otherwise have gained; but it does not follow that they will be finally lost. They may, by repentance and faith, obtain mercy. The words, "I know you not," may simply mean, I do not recognize you as guests, or friends, at my marriage feast; for when the invitation was given you, and the door was open, you were not ready. It will be seen from the parable that the five who were not admitted to the wedding feast, were virgins as well as those who were admitted. The foolish virgins had lamps the same as the wise. They trimmed their lamps the same as the wise. They went forth to meet the bridegroom the same as the wise. But they differed from the wise virgins in that they took no oil with them besides what their lamps contained. For this they are pronounced foolish, for the bridegroom tarrying longer than they expected, the oil already in their lamps was not enough; and on the coming of the bridegroom their lamps were going out, not gone out; they were still burning, but burning dimly for want of more oil. Not wishing to be excluded from the feast, they went to the store to purchase more, after having tried in vain to get some from their companions; for the wise virgins were afraid if they parted with any of theirs, none of them might have enough. Returning from the oil merchant with a supply, they replenished their lamps; but, alas, this hindrance threw them too late to enter with the rest. They sought admittance, but the door was shut. They were not blamed for slumbering and sleeping, for the wise virgins did that as well as themselves. They were culpable for their lack of oil, and so not being ready when the bridegroom came. The class of persons, therefore, represented by the foolish virgins, when the great Bridegroom, the Lord Jesus Christ, shall appear, will evidently suffer the loss of distinguished privilege and blessing; but nevertheless, they may be ultimately saved. Under the righteous reign of the Christ and his saints, wonderful blessings will be enjoyed, and obtaining forgiveness and favor, their salvation may be secured; but though saved, they will suffer a loss which can never be repaired.

This parable shows most conclusively the falsity of the prevailing view concerning the world's conversion previous to the Lord's coming. When he comes, he will not find the peoples of the earth to be all wise virgins; he will find a great many foolish ones. He will not find them all holding the truth and enjoying the light concerning his appearing and his kingdom. He will not find all in a condition of preparedness. On the contrary, he will find a lack of faith and a lack of love, and multitudes will be even in an attitude of opposition to his building up again the throne of David.

This parable is also intended to enforce the duty of watchfulness on the ground of the exact time of the Bridegroom's coming being unknown. He is expected to come, and yet not knowing the hour of his coming, He will come at a moment when, by many, at least, he is not expected. This duty of watching, and which is the chief end of the parable, is given in verse 13: "Watch therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour." We are not to understand by watching that we are not to take rest and seek invigoration of body in sleep, but that we are to live in a state of readiness for the Advent; that we are to meditate upon it, converse upon it, spread the truth concerning it, and even regard it as imminent. The virgins in the parable were not blamed for slumbering and sleeping; for waiting till midnight they naturally became drowsy. The wise virgins were overtaken with sleep as well as the foolish; their wisdom consisted in being ready at a moment's notice on the announcement being made of the bridegroom's appearance, for they not only had their lamps lighted, but a sufficiency of oil to keep them burning as long as they were needed on that occasion. And the folly of the foolish virgins consisted in not being ready, in not having a sufficiency of oil. It is a great mistake, and yet one that is often made, to regard the drowsiness of the wise virgins as illustrative of the carelessness and indifference of even the better part of the Church; for this, pressed to its legitimate conclusion, would prove that none were prepared to meet the Bridegroom. For, as in the parable, the preparation consisted, not in keeping off sleep, which is natural at so late an hour, but in having well trimmed and brightly burning lamps, and oil in their oil-vessels, all in readiness at a moment's warning; so when the trumpet sounds, the Christian's preparation will be in having truth and light and grace and love and hope in the heart. Dr. W. Nast, in his comment on this passage, says, "To understand by this falling asleep a spiritual drowsiness or lukewarmness involves a self-contradiction; for, how can such a state exist when the heart is filled with the Holy Spirit, as is indicated by the wise having oil in their vessels." Albert Barnes, in his Notes, says, "Waiting till near midnight, they fell into repose. This circumstance is not to be pressed to prove that all Christians will be asleep, or cold and careless, when the Lord Jesus will come." The slumbering then is not to be taken in an unfavorable sense. The great thought inculcated in the parable, the practical teaching to be deduced from the whole is, the vast importance of constant preparation. "Therefore be ye also ready: for in an hour that ye think not the Son of man cometh." Matt. xxiv. 44. SILAS HENN.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 14.

Leading thought: Justification.

Golden Text: "Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised for our justification." Rom. 4, 25.

Mankind has been seeking for justification ever since Abel offered his sacrifice for sin. All through the different dispensations we find types and shadows that point to something better by which the sinners unto might be made perfect.

The Hero of the New Testament undertook for man and "he is our justification." Acts 13, 39.

Question. What is justification?

Answer. Justification is to be saved from the consequences of sin.

Q. What are the consequences of sin?

A. Rom. 6, 23.

Q. How do we get life?

A. Tim. 1, 10.

Q. How are we justified?

A. Gal. 3, 27–29; Titus 3, 5–7; 1 Cor. 6, 11; Rom. 8, 17, 18; Acts 13, 38, 39.

Q. Did the Law make perfect?

A. Gal. 2, 16.

Q. What was the use of the Law?

A. Gal. 3, 24.

Q. Will faith alone bring justification?

A. James 2, 20–26.

Q. Are we justified by works?

A. James 2, 17, 18.

Q. Are works alone sufficient?

A. 1 Cor. 13, 2, 3.

We, who live in the gospel dispensation, have much more to found our faith upon than had the early Christians. The Patriarchs believed the simple promise.

If our love were but more simple,
We should take him at his word,
And our lives would be all a canticle,
In the sweetness of our Lord.

What Constitutes Burial!

The excuses which people can devise in order to bolster themselves up in a wrong practice, are legion. An excuse is not an argument, although it commonly passes for one. The Congregationalist of June 2nd quotes the following from a tract published by W. Emery, 284 years ago, saying, by way of comment, that the writer "pushed immersionists hard toward a conclusion more rational than agreeable." He said: "How are you 'buried with Christ by baptism' when Christ's burial was not his going into the earth and rising suddenly as you do out of the waters; but his burial must be three days and three nights which is a mystery you know not; let the Anabaptists lie so long in the waters, then I'll say they are dipped indeed!" And this is thought to be a disagreeable pressure of immersionists. It must then be considered the strongest argument in behalf of sprinkling. Let us therefore analyze it.

1. Granting for the moment that his point against immersion is well taken, his argument would amount to this: "Immersion in water is not in the likeness of Christ's burial, because those immersed do not stay under the water as long as Christ was in the earth; therefore sprinkling is a likeness of Christ's burial!" This is the common way of self-justification. When one is accused of wrong-doing, he points to some one else, and says, "Well, he is doing wrong too;" and then he feels that he has fully cleared himself of the charge brought against him, and proved that he is in the right. Such methods are childish in the extreme.

2. Our author not only denies that immersion is baptism, but he denies that immersion is dipping. Says he: "Let the Anabaptists lie so long in the waters, then I'll say they are dipped indeed." As much as to say that a thing cannot be said to be dipped in water unless it remains there a few days! Our Pedo-baptist friends will have to give us a new vocabulary, so that we may know what word to use in the place of "dip," when we wish to speak of anything placed in the water for only a moment. When Christ was importuned to tell who should betray him, he replied: "He it is, to whom I shall give a sop, when I have dipped it." John xiii. 26. And the same verse continues: "And when he had dipped the sop, he gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon." Would our ancient author, and the Congregationalist, which sustains him, claim that the sop remained in the dish three days and three nights before it was given to Judas? Certainly not, for they know that the whole supper lasted but a portion of one evening. But the sop was "dipt," for the Scriptures so declares. Then a thing may be said to be dipped, even though it remains immersed only a moment. It ought not to be necessary to go to Scripture to prove a thing which is proved by the language of common sense; but many people imagine that Bible language has a different meaning from that of common sense.

3. This also shows the absurdity of supposing that immersion cannot exhibit the likeness of Christ's burial unless the person immersed remains under water as long as Christ was in the earth. "Baptize" means to immerse, to plunge, to dip; and just as a thing is dipped, even though it remains in the liquid but a moment, so a person is baptized although he is in water but a moment. Christ would have been buried, even if he had been raised immediately after being placed in Joseph's tomb; so a man who is buried in the water for only a moment is as surely "buried with him by baptism," as though he remained under the water forever. And added to all this is the tacitly admitted fact that baptism must be a likeness of the burial of Christ, and that nothing but immersion does represent that event.—Signs of the Times.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weethee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with enormous ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar terms, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth, Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Eastern Question
In its various phases.—Egyptian, British, Russian, Ottoman, Hebrew, American and Mussulman, by J. P. Weethee. The title of this book gives a good idea of its contents, and the reputation of the author is a guarantee of its worth. The subject as a whole, and in its different divisions is handled in a masterly manner, and the reader is convinced at once that the author has spared no labor in the study of his topics. The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 360 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $1.25. Send to this office; orders will now be promptly filled, as we have received an invoice of the book, and will send direct from here. The two books, "Coming Age" and "Eastern Question." If ordered together, $2.00.

For Six Months . . .50
Three Months . . .25

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

SPECIAL ATTENTION

Is Called to this Circular.

PLEASE READ EVERY WORD.

Any friend of THE RESTITUTION is authorized to act as its Agent. We want our list doubled, and we earnestly ask you to promptly renew your own subscription, if not already done, and send us one or more new names for 1888. We thank many for what they have done in this way, and only ask a continuance of the same.

There are many places scattered all over our land where we have a company of believers numbering from 10 to 100, and only about one in ten taking our church paper. Could we visit such we think more could be induced to subscribe, but as we cannot do so, we would like to employ some good, energetic brother or sister in such localities to work for us. We do not ask this for nothing; we will willingly pay you for your time. A very liberal commission will be paid any one who will labor in this direction.

We send THE RESTITUTION to any poor deserving person who asks it, FREE of expense to them. We have done this for two years now, and shall continue to do so. We take no credit for supplying these papers to ourselves. We agreed with the good Lord that we would do this work of charity if he would put it into the hearts of his people who had money to furnish us the means to do so, and praise to his holy name, the needful has been forthcoming. No sinking fund exists here—every cent entrusted to our care is faithfully applied to the work it is designed for—that of sending papers or books to the poor, or to workers in mission fields. We trust our brethren and sisters will not neglect this part of their Christian privilege and duty. The same train that bears your letter with your subscription for 1888 to us, may carry a message of distress from some worthy child of God, telling that sickness or other causes renders it impossible for him to renew. What a comfort to this poor, weak one, if out of your abundance you have seen fit to send us an extra dollar. Or perhaps you have sacrificed somewhat to send it—and we can then send back word, Cheer up, faint not; the Lord has provided means to give you your desire.

Some complain that, having sent papers or books to friends or relatives, it seemed they were not appreciated, no good result could be seen. Paul says, "I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase." Brother, it is yours to plant, God will take care of his part. The reward is for those who continue in well doing unto the end. Not those who do well for a short time, and then rest from good works to try and see the effect, but those who continue faithfully at work will wear the crowns.

We ask every one whose time has expired or will be out with the end of the present year, to renew at once—don't wait a month after your time is out, but have the money here before, and have credit ahead for ones.

Be sure and send all money by Post Office Money Order, Express Money Order, Bank Draft, or Registered Letter, and remember that money sent loose in letters or by Postal Note is unsafe. Address all letters, and have all orders made payable, to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Ind.

A Son of God, and its Significance as used in the Scriptures.

There is so much misapprehension even among religious and church people in regard to the significance of this term "a son of God" that it seems timely to once more emphasize the true Scriptural teaching on this subject of the "sonship." Every one who is at all familiar with the Scriptures is, of course, aware of the constant recurrence of the phrases "son of man" and "son of God;" but very few comparatively, even of religious people, seem to understand the significance of these phrases as clearly taught in the Scriptures themselves. This signifi cance it is the object of this article to make clear. It should first be said, however, that the translators of the "Old Covenant Scriptures" have obscured this subject by mistranslation, omission, and perversion of passages which directly as well as indirectly teach this truth, some of which passages will be referred to in the course of this article.

To premise, therefore the doctrine of the "sonship" as assumed or revealed in the Scriptures is this. "A son of man" is a descendant of Adam according to the well known physical laws of natural generation, and under the simple "covenant of obedience" which God made with Adam, namely, that with obedience he should continue to have life, but that with disobedience he should incur death. In each case natural generic results or consequences spoken of or meant. Life here means physical, natural life, and death means natural, physical death, nothing more nor less.

Of course this first covenant of life contemplates and looks forward to its ultimate enlargement "in Christ;" but we have no right to assume this enlargement before it comes, in either of its consequences, namely the second life or the second death, in short we have no right "to go outside of the record." And up to the point of the Adamic transgression no immortality or eternal life good or bad had been conferred upon mankind so far as the record shows. But a conditional promise is made that "in the seed of the woman" this possibility and this enlargement of life would be ultimately realized. And this promise and this possibility gives rise to the hope and the embodiment of the hope in the phrase "Son of God" as applied to mortal men as early even as in Genesis, but never throughout the whole range of Scripture, Old or New, to the angels or any other created being. "For to which of the angels hath he said at any time, thou art my son, today have I begotten thee?"

Just here comes in the iniquity of mistranslation and perversion. For in flat contradiction of this statement in Hebrews, chap. i., you find in the Common Version as well as Revised, Job i 6, the angels called "sons of God." In the text, however, it reads "angels." This same perversion occurs in several of the Psalms also.

To return, however, from the time of "the promise" and the selection of Seth as the progenitor of the "seed" line on down through the ages to the fulfilment of this promise in "the Christ" this phrase "Son of God" or "gods" is of constant recurrence as a distinctive phraseology applied to mortal men who come under the "covenants" of law and of grace. One Psalm will suffice to illustrate this fact to the general truth-seeker; the 82nd namely, from which the Christ himself quotes to justify himself when accused of presumption and blasphemy for having claimed to be "a son of God." In this Psalm it is evident even to the casual reader that God is addressing men (not angels nor any other being) under the phraseology first of "gods" (disposers) and then of "sons;" and it is just as distinctly stated in this same Psalm that these same persons who have been called "gods" and "sons of God" are mortal and that they die like the rest of mankind.

What then is a "son of God" in Scriptural phraseology? Very evidently a mortal human being who has a conditional promise and possibility of becoming immortal or "a partaker of the divine nature," or in other words "a son of God in promise." What then is the first condition of realization? The Scripture answer to this interrogatory is found in the Christ's own language to Nicodemus, not "you must be born again," but "you must be begotten from above." Of course this implies a second begetting. Common sense would accept this without being specifically told. The important fact here emphasized is the source of the begetting. It is taken for granted and goes without saying that we all have had a lower begetting or a first begetting according to the flesh, or a natural begetting, and the important thing for us to understand is that we must be begotten from above if we expect to become "sons of God" and "offspring of the Most High." For according to our first begetting we are only "sons of men." The grafting process is used to illustrate this truth in the Scriptures. If by nature we be wild olives, how can we become changed to the tame or the higher utility of the domestic olive? By having the tame grafted into our wild stock, or vice versa is the statement.

People have a difficulty in understanding and object to the dual life, which is the result of the new spiritual begetting of the natural man while still in the flesh. But here in the blended life of the wild and the domestic olive is a practical solution of the difficulty and an illustration of the process. Is it any more difficult for the Author of all life to blend the natural and the spiritual life in the individual human being than it is in the individual olive tree?

The illustration of this truth is also given under the figure of the vine in the Christ's own language, as given by John in his gospel. "I am the true vine and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch engrafted (this word commonly translated branch means just what we mean by an engrafted scion; there is another word for the general term branch) in me that beareth not fruit he taketh it away." Christ is also called a "shoot from the root of Jesse" in Hesaias. If this be a true figure how can we come to be "in Christ" except we be grafted into this "shoot from the root of Jesse."

This is the only rational explanation of the legal history of the Christ himself and makes it clear why he constantly refers to himself both as "a son of man" and "a son of God." He first receives the natural Adamic life which every human being receives, from his mother in the line of David through the special intervention of God's power exerted spiritually, in other words "is created in all points" as we are, in other words "becomes a partaker of flesh and blood;" in other words, "For surely not of angels does he take upon himself (that is become a partaker) but of Habraam's seed doth he take upon himself," in other words becomes mortal. Why? "That through death he might abrogate him who hath the control of death, namely, the devil. Any one who has made a study of this word "diabolos" (Anglicised into devil) and its general as well as specific use in the Scriptures will understand how the death of the Christ "abrogates (a legal term) the control of the Diabolos." He, the devil, is as it were by the appointment of the Most High at the court of heaven "The State's Attorney." He is called "the accuser of his brethren." He is constantly represented as a malicious perverter of his office and power.

The characters of Aman and Mardochaios in the book of Esther are designed to illustrate this truth. The scene opens with Aman filling the office and acting as the Court Accuser, in his personal spite and wickedness maliciously perverting his office and power. By divine intervention through human instrumentalities his plan and purpose is thwarted and he is punished, while the very one toward whom his wicked spite is directed is exalted to fill the office vacated by his punishment and death; and both these persons in their official relation to the Court of the Great King, both Aman and Mardochaios are called diabolos or "devils." Also dragons in the explanation of the dream. Mardochaios in other words is a type of the Christ as "our advocate" opposed to the wiles and machinations of our "Great Adversary" Satan, of whom Aman (no verity) is a remarkable type also. The meaning of the name Mardochaios (a recipient of illumination) also significant. Now how did Mardochaios abrogate the controling power which the wicked Aman had over death? By getting him removed from his office and power and through death as an instrumentality. Even so does the Christ, and even so will the Diabolos Satan be abrogated by "the Son of God" as the "true Advocate." Was Mardochaios "a Son of God?" Yes. "I have said ye are all sons of God and offspring of the Most High." Who is meant by "ye?" "All Israel." All God's people whether under the Old or the New Covenant. All regenerated people. Are "sons of God" in promise perfected spiritual beings? No. The resurrection is the spiritual birth and the time when the spiritual body is received and the "promise" realized. "These (the roll-call of the martyrs) all died not having realized the promise, God having looked forward to something more efficient for us, that they might not be perfected without us."

How was the Christ as "a son of God" perfected? Through "suffering and death." When was he perfected? "On the third day." Lo, I go my way today and tomorrow and the third day I shall have been perfected." And again, "The issues of life are through and out from death." And again, "He (the Christ) is the first born (brought forth) from among the dead," and "the first born of many brethren." He was the first to realize the promise, in other words, and the first to become a full organic "partaker of the divine nature," or "a Son of God" in fact and the full sense of the term.

Where it says in the translations, "Now are ye sons," it should read, "now are offspring."

On a Mission to the Land of my Fathers.

At last the long-cherished hope fulfilled. We arrived in Jaffa, or ancient Joppa. Now memory is taxed to its utmost in calling to mind the numerous legends, historical facts, and, above all, Scriptural associations, so tenderly engraven upon the heart, when, at a mother's knee, truth was learned about the Land of Israel. And who can look upon and walk through the streets of that city, without thinking about him whose is the earth and the fulness thereof? The city itself stands close to the shore; very picturesque from the distance.

This city, according to Pliny, was full of life and power before the Flood. Standing on the shore, the sea view is delightful; numbers of small boats passing through the legendary spot where stands the jagged reef, to one point of which the famous Andromeda was chained, and rescued by Perseus.

In this locality the tribe of Dan distinguished itself with its conquest, when, under Joshua, the land was taken. Josh. xix. 46.

To this city was brought the wood from Lebanon, for the building of the first and second temples for Israel's tribes, and for the glory of the God of Israel, 2 Chron. ii. 16; Ezra iii. 7.

It was from here that Jonah started on his unfortunate voyage when he fled from the Lord and from the path of duty. It was in this city that Dorcas lived, as an angel of mercy ministering unto the needy; as a true disciple of Christ, extending his kingdom by a noble life of charity.

It was here that Peter, in the name of the Lord, performed his great miracle, when, after the death of Dorcas, he prayed, and raised her from death. Here stands the house where Simon, the tanner, lived, and whose hospitality Peter enjoyed—spot of many sacred and precious associations. Here many blessed hours were spent by the disciples of Christ as they worshiped their risen Lord. The house is built of large stones; the walls very thick. In every sense the mark of many generations is upon the antique building. Narrow steps lead up to the flat roof from whence Peter saw, in vision, "Heaven opened, and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet, knit at the four corners, and let down to the earth, wherein were all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. Acts ix. 36; x. 1-34. The house is now largely used by the Mohammedans for prayer. Here several followers of the Arabian prophet spread their praying rugs, on which, with seeming great earnestness, they prostrated themselves in prayer to Allah and the prophet.

Leaving this interesting traditional spot and turning to the right we again come into contact with a busy crowd of pilgrims from Russia who were hastening to Jerusalem, and some returning from the holy city, with the satisfaction of having been present at the important service in the church where the holy fire was seen, and the Patriarch's benediction received.

A most touching scene, which I will never forget, was, when a company of Jews having just landed, and so overcome with the thought of being, for the first time in their lives, in the land of their fathers, as if in ecstacies, fell on the ground, and most devoutly kissed the soil under them, repeating, Arets Israel! Arets Israel!—Land of Israel! Land of Israel!—and these poor fellows were surrounded by a crowd of half-naked Arabs, who howled and yelled like savages; and some of them took special delight in jeering and offering insults to the sons of Abraham.

A walk through the bazaar offers considerable interest and amusement: people from all nations taking delight in observing the ways and manners of Oriental business transactions; Bedouins making their purchases; Jews selling their goods with an enthusiasm as if attending to the most sacred duties in life; shopkeepers generally sitting on the ground, smoking cigarettes and pipes and drinking coffee, whilst their goods are being inspected by customers. Here I was delighted in meeting a young man who conversed with Jews about the truth of Christianity. Having joined the company in conversation, it was delightful to find the readiness with which some of these Israelites listened to the message of peace, and received Christian tracts in Hebrew.

A visit to the Protestant school, under the management of Miss Arnot, is interesting. Here Arab and Jewish children receive a good education, and gospel truths are instilled in the minds of the young. This school is specially for girls. Considering the condition of Oriental women, being a state of ignorance, superstition, and degredation, I was more than ever proud of my adopted country when finding that the school was liberally supported by the English Christian public. God bless the school and reward every subscriber for the interest and help on behalf of the lamentably ignorant daughters of Jaffa.

The scenery all round this ancient city is most charming. Orange flowers and ripe fruit are seen on the same trees. Their fragrance is wafted for several miles over the plains of Sharon, and for considerable distance over the sea. Walking round the balconies of our hotel, a magnificent view of the city and its neighborhood presents itself. On one side we behold orange gardens in great loveliness, a fine view of the environs of the city, and the mountains of Judea. On the other side we behold with interest and considerable amusement stalking camels in single file procession, tied together by halter and tail, laden with produce; others obediently resting on their knees, ready to receive the burdens they are so accustomed to carry over the sandy deserts.

Having rested long enough in this city, and seen everything of interest with delight, we made our preparations for the journey to Jerusalem.

Everything was now ready for the start. A lively and interesting scene presented itself. Travellers of various nationalities, with Arabian attendants, with their colored flowing garments, some of them fully armed, as if going to war; some, for the first time, take to ride on horseback and donkeys; others, not bold enough to venture a long ride on the saddle, prefer going by carriage.

The journey, once begun, continues to attract and interest.

After a short ride of about half an hour, the traveller finds himself in the country that reminds him of the ancient description, "A land flowing with milk and honey." If the traveller does not see milk and honey, he certainly beholds other objects of delight and luxury. On the right are the beautiful orange, lemon, pomegranate, and other fruit gardens. After a curious view of the place, where our dragoman informed us is the spot of Dorcas' tomb, we proceeded to the famous plain of Sharon, from of old celebrated for its exquisite fertility and beauty. While passing through it, we gazed and admired with feelings of sacred pleasure; we gathered bunches of flowers, lilies, tulips, and roses; we thought of the Royal preacher who said, "I am the Rose of Sharon." We thought of the poor downtrodden sons and daughters of Jacob, who, alas! are like a wilderness; who "shall yet blossom abundantly; and rejoice even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, and the excellency of Carmel and Sharon, they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God," Isa. xxxv. 1. 2. After going a little further on, we passed the old village, Hazer-Shual, which was, under Joshua, no doubt, a prosperous town. Josh. xix. 3.

Near this village, Abraham's fountain is pointed out to us by the dragoman, who is, however, careful to say that he is not very sure that it really was the "Fountain of Abraham!" With pleasure we proceed until we arrive at Beth Dagon—house of Dagon. Josh. xv. 41.

With no little interest did we inspect well the village and plains of Yazur, the memorable scene of Samson, with the three hundred foxes and firebrands, Judges xv. 4, 5.

Being tired by our long ride, we rested at Ramleh—the Arimathea of the New Testament. Here resided the disciple Joseph, in whose new tomb the Lord was laid. Matt. xxvii. 57.

Here were scenes of great and bitter conflicts between the Crusaders and Moslems. The mosque, once a church built by the Crusaders, still stands as a monument of the conflict between the heroes of the Cross and Crescent.

From Ramleh we pass on to the valley of Aijalon. With an open Bible in hand we are forcibly reminded of the marvellous triumph of Joshua, when the sun stood still in Gibeon, and the moon in the valley of Aijalon. Josh. x. 12–14.

Passing through Latroon, Naopolis, Yalo, Beit Nuba, we come to Kiriath Jearim. Josh. ix. 17. This is one of the most interesting spots on the road between Jaffa and Jerusalem. Here, no doubt, was a stronghold of the Canaanites and the worship of Baal. The well-preserved ruins of the grand old church, which, in its time, was in the possession of the Saracens, Crusaders, and early Christians.

Here was a landmark between Benjamin and Judah. Here the Ark of Israel rested in the house of Abinadab, until David took it to Zion. 2 Sam. vi. Oh, oh, we go, gazing with wistful eyes, while every movement is bringing it nearer and nearer to the old metropolis of the world, the City of David, the Mount Zion of our poetry and song, at length we behold the Tower of David, and with reverence and emotion we pass through the Jaffa Gate, and for the first time in life we walk in the streets of Jerusalem.

"Jerusalem, my happy home,
Name ever dear to me."

The Gardens of Egypt.

At the beginning of March the gardens of Egypt are really wonderful; the orange and lemon trees spread their most pungent odor; the rose trees are covered with innumerable flowers; the palms, with their green and white crowns, swing them in the wind; the oleanders there border the avenues; on the lawns, anemones, annual and perpetual flowering pinks, chrysanthemums, violets, alyssus, periwinkles, snap-dragons, mignonette, pansies, and petunias blend their innumerable colors with the green trees, bushes and shrubs. Groups of bamboo lift here and there their long green and golden stems, crowned with an immense plume of pretty little trembling leaves. One comprehends, on seeing these stems, which assume in a few months enormous proportions, the cruelly ingenious punishment of the Chinese in binding a criminal to a young bamboo. The plant grows, and the wretch is quartered in a few weeks. No wood is lighter or more useful than that of the bamboo. But what gives, at least during winter and spring, the most smiling aspect to the Egyptian gardens are the great sheets of rose bougainvilleas that cling to the walls, the trees and groups of foliage, and which displays everywhere the exquisite tints of their flowers. The bougainvilleas is certainly the finest of climbing plants. During five months its flowers under the winter sun take shades of extreme delicacy—one might say a light rose trail, the intensity of which every play of light varies. The aloes, the agave, attach themselves to rocky slopes. On the banks of the watercourses the blue lotus and papyrus still revive antique reminiscences. Grass cannot be raised in Egypt. The layer of soil is so thin that the sun dries it up immediately, and unless the grass be constantly submerged, it turns yellow and perishes at once. It is not the heat alone that produces this result, for there is much fine grass in the tropics; but the heat accompanied with the shallowness of the soil, renders the cultivation of grass impossible in Egypt. It is with difficulty that a few isolated blades of grass sprout during winter along the Nile and the canals; they disappear as soon as spring begins, so that everywhere in the country where artificial cultivation finishes, the dry, bare desert begins.

Excommunication Braved.

Missionary work in the United States of Columbia has of late been restricted almost entirely to the city of Bogota, owing to the difficulties of travel and the unsettled state of the country. The gospel, however, has made its way into the country, through pupils in the mission schools at Bogota going to reside in other cities. Recently, Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell have ventured on a tour, which they describe in a letter to the Church, and have been surprised to find that their former pupils have been enabled to do. They encountered opposition in every place from the Roman Catholic priests, but were not driven back, and in many places were welcomed in spite of them. Mrs. Caldwell says:

"The war the priests make against the Bible is something surprising. From Tunja they sent word to one place and another, and the priests of each place have preached against us and our 'prohibited books.' They are careful not to say that it is the Bible we desire to sell, but say that the books are bad ones, very bad ones, and thus make the people think that they are immoral, obscene books. Some have been very much surprised when they have found that it was the Bible we were selling. Where the priest comes out openly and attacks Mr. Caldwell in the streets, the sales as a rule have been increased, because he could be answered before the people, and the falsity of his statements shown; but where they only preach against the books in a church crowded with ignorant people, with no one to refute the misstatements, the effect is often very great. For example, the Sabbath before we arrived at Pie de Cuesta, the priest announced our coming, and spoke at length about the very bad books, saying over and over again that the people should not buy the dreadful books, or even look at them, and threatening anyone who should disobey his commands with instant excommunication. He also warned the people that they should not give us boarding, and said that he would excommunicate any one receiving us. I asked our landlady if she was not afraid of losing her soul for having received us and treated us so kindly. 'No,' she replied, 'I am not afraid, and it makes but little difference to me what the priest says.'"

A rumor comes by way of Vienna that the Czar of Russia was wounded in an attempt made to assassinate him, and that a revolutionary movement had broken out at St. Petersburgh. ANOTHER item of news is, that a tract of land in China larger than the State of Massachusetts, and much more densely populated has been completely submerged under water, causing one of the greatest calamities of the world's history.

JERUSALEM.

Prophesy abundantly shows that the golden age of Immanuel's land, and the exalted position to be occupied by the metropolis of the country promised to the Father of the Faithful and his exalted heir—the City of the Great King—are to be realized after the times of the Gentiles shall have been fulfilled. As we are now almost certainly living in the last generation of these Gentile times, everything pertaining to Jerusalem, Palestine, and the Orient generally, are matters of paramount importance. Commercial as well as political changes are to be carefully noted. The following item is certainly significant as a sign that Jerusalem's warfare is nearly accomplished, and that God's holy Sanctuary places are not much longer to be trodden under foot. How surprising has been the changes that a very few years have effected, both in the political and commercial condition of Palestine and Jerusalem.

THE TRADE IN JERUSALEM.

"The total imports of goods into Jerusalem in the year 1836, according to the Customs Office figures, amounted to the value of 6,706,400f., and the total exports to 4,749,200f. Among the principal imports are sugar from Austria, France, Egypt, and Russia; rice from Egypt and England; flour, chiefly from Russia and Austria; iron wares, from England and France; wood, from Austria, Russia, etc.; manufactured goods from England, France, Switzerland; cotton goods, from Austria, Germany, England, etc. The principal exports were oranges and lemons to Europe, America, Turkey, and Egypt; sesame to France, Italy, Egypt, Russia, Turkey; soap to Egypt; water melons and vegetables to Egypt and Turkey."

PALESTINE SCENERY.

The name Palestine was originally restricted to a strip of country situated along the southeastern border of the Mediterranean Sea, a country originally extending perhaps as far north as Mount Carmel. At first it meant nothing more than Philistia. In later times the name of this maritime province was extended so as to embrace the whole country of the Jews, both west and east of the Jordan.

In 1874 Ralph Merrill was appointed archæologist of the American Exploration Society, and he entered upon his work in Dec. 1875, and continued his labors until the summer of 1877, when he returned to America. The account of his explorations and travels is given in an interesting volume of about 550 pages, entitled, "East of the Jordan." It was in the country beyond the Jordan that John the Baptist exercised most of his ministry, and it was in the castle of Machaerus on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea that he was imprisoned and finally beheaded. A part of the time of our Lord's ministry was spent on the same side of the river. From Mr. Merrill's work we select two extracts illustrating our heading. The scenery described was near the Wady Yabis, a stream flowing into the Jordan on the East side some thing like about one third of the way down from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. It is supposed that in the name Wady Yabis the ancient name Jabesh Gilead has been preserved, a town made famous in Old Testament narratives from certain events connected with its history. The time when Mr. Merrill was encamped on this stream was March, 1876. As pen pictures of nature, as displayed just east of the Jordan, we feel sure our readers will be pleased to peruse these animated descriptions which follow, the day of date being Sunday, March 12, 1876.

"Today I hoped to read a great deal, but it is almost eight o'clock in the evening and I have just commenced. It occupied me nearly all the forenoon to take care of my flowers — a which must be done or they would spoil. After dinner some Bedawin Sheiks came and stayed a long time; when they had gone I tried to take a nap, but was awakened by the cold nose of one of our dogs in contact with my own, and so gave it up. I then went to the top of one of the foot-hills in the rear of our tents, overlooking the lower portion of Wady Yabis, in order to enjoy the view of the great valley stretching out before me and on either hand, through which ran the Jordan in its winding course, and beyond which rose the magnificent hills of Western Palestine.

"I can hardly express how thankful I was for a day of rest, even though I knew I could not enjoy or observe it in the way I should were I at home. But it has been a perfect summer day, like one of those during the last part of June or the first part of July in New England when the weather is sweltering. All nature is alive here; trees, shrubs, grass, flowers, are growing with all their might. The air is thick with the steam of rank, luxuriant vegetation. At home we talk about 'the hum of insects.' It is not an exaggeration to say that the air here has been filled with the roar of insects. As I sat on the hill-top just referred to, the volume of sound swelled up from the great plain and filled the sky. I never before witnessed or experienced anything of the kind so impressive as this. It was inspiring to realize that I was surrounded by as much vocal life, as well as by an infinite world of life, that could express itself only by greenness, fragrance and beauty. But the day, with all its loveliness, was fearfully hot. At noon it was 70 deg. in our tent, and as uncomfortable as 100 deg. would be in New England. Towards night some clouds and a slight breeze came up, and this evening the air is quite cool. The broken clouds, as they pass before the sun, throw some beautiful shadows on the hills and plains. One day recently I saw a large section of the Jordan plain which seemed to have been transformed into a lake. All my companions said that the resemblance was striking and perfect. Any person seeing it suddenly would have exclaimed: 'Yonder is a lake twenty or thirty miles in length, and how beautiful it is!' But that section was covered by a dense cloud which stood above it, all around which the sun was pouring down its rays."

Mr. Merrill then describes the rank growth of the vegetation on the uncultivated lands. This description shows most plainly the fertility of the soil, and how well adapted it would be to the production of the most abundant crops of grain if cleared of its wild noxious growth. The careful culture of the skilled agriculturist would, as in the olden times, be rewarded with the "thirty, sixty, and a hundredfold." Our author thus describes the wild growth of the Wady Yabis:

"No one who has not experienced it can realize the savage nature of these alder bushes and trees which are so abundant in this valley. Sometimes, by accident, one gets jostled against a bush of that kind, and it is almost impossible to extricate one's self from its grasp. When a fine bird was perched upon such a tree, we seldom shot it, but waited until it flew elsewhere, for if when shot it fell into the alder bush it was generally impossible to recover it, and we gave it up for lost. Trees, shrubs, weeds, and flowers, and, in fact, almost all kinds of plants in this country, appear to be armed with thorns. A field of thistles will sometimes send us a mile or more out of our way in order to go around it, for we could not make our way through it. Besides the mustard, which is often as high as my shoulders when on horseback, fennel stalks are likewise ten and twelve feet in height. It grows wild here, and the seeds have the same taste as the sweet fennel, which we cultivate at home. The farmer or gardener in America often complains of the weeds; but here I could show him a paradise of weeds, out of which it would be difficult to make sufficient mowings, or climb without a ladder. I have forced my way through them for an hour at a time without once seeing the ground except where I trod them down, my head and shoulders only appearing above the great sea of color. In wading through oceans of weeds and thistles, and struggling with alder-bushes, where I am constantly scratched, torn, and bruised, I have often thought how convenient a sole-leather suit would be. One of the most difficult tasks I have to perform is that of mending my clothes after a day's experience with these thistles, alder-trees, and other thorny shrubs, and likewise with the rocks in these wild ravines and with the stones in the various ruins. I could get along better if my hands did not become scratched, bruised, and stiffened in this rough work. There is one passage of Scripture uppermost in my mind at such times, namely, where it speaks of "the crackling of thorns under a pot." I get a good deal of comfort from those words, "the crackling of thorns," for I realize that, although they may tear my flesh and clothes, yet they can be subdued by fire. The satisfaction comes from thinking of these cruel persecutors as being consumed by flames."

TWO FRIENDS OF THE PERSECUTED JEWS.

In the Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times of Dec. 1, we find the following narratives of two ladies who have devoted themselves to the cause of Israel. They have not only endeavored to alleviate the sufferings of the exiled Jews, but have also made earnest efforts to lead them to see the truth as it is in Jesus. For the kindness they have shown to the persecuted outcasts of Israel they are worthy of all the honor that they have won for themselves for all their labors of love. As all the readers of THE RESTITUTION feel a lively interest in the literal fulfillment of prophesy in relation to the return of the exiled nation to the land of their fathers, the following account of these two ladies will be perused with pleasure. As several of our subscribers are lineally descended from Abraham, to whom—in connection with his one seed, the Messiah—the original promises were made, we trust our selection will specially please them. Some time ago we published an instructive article on the ten pieces of silver, and the piece that was lost, as rendered in Luke xv. 8, 9. Which was a part of one of Miss Finkelstein's lectures.

MRS. FINN.

Mrs. Finn is a native of Warsaw in Poland, where she was born nearly sixty years ago. Her father was the late Dr. McCaul, the eminent Hebrew scholar and historian, who for many years made his home amongst the Jews of Russia and Poland, and found his most intimate friends among the Jewish Rabbis of those lands. She passed her early years in Warsaw, and saw much of these Jewish teachers, one of whom was so much interested in the child that he taught her Hebrew and guided her studies in Jewish literature. Subsequently her father removed to Breslau, where she became proficient in the German language and literature. Still later she accompanied her father to Ireland, and finally to his last place of residence at Palestine Place, London, England. There he continued his labors on behalf of the Jews. At his house Jews from every nation under the sun might be found, who, called to London on business, found there congenial society and ready sympathy, and since his death it has not lost its associations, for it has now become the centre of the missionary operations of the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews.

In the year 1841 the King of Prussia, whose acquaintance Dr. McCaul had made in Germany, proposed the foundation of a Protestant Anglo-Prussian Bishopric in Jerusalem, and asked him to be the Bishop. This honor Dr. McCaul declined on the ground that it should be held by one of Jewish birth, and recurred to nominate his friend Dr. M. S. Alexander. The nomination was accepted, and at Dr. Alexander's consecration Dr. McCaul preached the sermon. There was present at that ceremony a friend who had taken active interest in the Bishopric, and in the work going on in the Holy Land, and who himself was an excellent Hebrew scholar, and had published a valuable work on the Spanish Jews. This was Mr. Finn, whose friendship for Dr. McCaul was destined to develop into a closer connection. He became a frequent visitor at Palestine Place, drawn thither, at first, by a community of interest in the Jews, but later by a growing affection for Miss McCaul. His affection was reciprocated, and they were married in 1846. Shortly afterward Mr. Finn's profound Hebraic knowledge, and his well-known interest in the Jewish race attracted the attention of the British Government, who at that time needed a representative in Palestine. Mr. Finn was made Consul for Palestine with a residence in Jerusalem itself, and there he and Mrs. Finn removed, and commenced a life of beneficent labor, congenial to them, beneficent to the country, and useful to the British Government. They held the position for seventeen years, and during that time endeared themselves to thousands of persons to whom Mr. Finn's official position enabled him to become a protector. Many remarkable incidents occurred during Mr. Finn's official term, which he has graphically described in his book entitled "Stirring Times."

The English Consulate at this time occupied the house adjoining Christ's Church on Mount Zion, and immediately faced the Castle of Hippicus, from which during Mohammedan feasts, it is customary to fire salutes with artillery. Mr. and Mrs. Finn having been away from home during one of these festivals, returned to make an unexpected discovery. The clumsy Turkish gunners had damaged their house. In firing one of the castle guns they had thrust into it, as an extra wadding, a soldier's old jacket with brass buttons, and this had been fired through the windows of the Consulate, the distance being very short. The bundle had crashed through the window, carrying glass and woodwork before it, and hit the wall opposite just above a bed in which a child would have been sleeping, if the Consul and Mrs. Finn had been at home.

Mr. Finn says: "The gunners were in the habit of ramming anything that came to hand into their cannon, to make the greater noise in the discharge. Some years before, a poor Jewess had a narrow escape of her life from this cause. She was passing down the narrow lane close to our house at the moment when a salute began. A troop of donkeys, just released from their loads, came scampering down the lane behind her, the donkey-boy lagging in the rear. The donkeys pushed past, one of them pinning the Jewess to the wall. At that instant the cannon was again fired; the wadding (an old soldier's jacket in this instance too) struck the donkey on the head killing it on the spot. The woman was covered with dust and blood of the slain beast, which had to be removed before she could be extricated, terribly shaken and frightened, but safe. The donkey had saved her life at the expense of his own."

The question of the employment of the poor Jewesses and of Jews, had from Mr. and Mrs. Finn's first arrival in Jerusalem engaged their attention. These poor people go to the Holy City from religious motives, and finding no employment there, sink into a condition of hopeless poverty. The first effort made was on behalf of the Jewesses, some of whom were given employment in sewing and knitting. After a couple of years this branch of the work was handed over to the late Miss Cooper, who founded a sewing and knitting school, which is still one of the Institutions of Jerusalem. Various occupations were tried for the men and boys, but with promised permanent success except agriculture and the various industries therewith connected. Efforts were made to encourage and promote agricultural industry during the whole time of Mrs. Finn's residence there, and the great fertility of the land was abundantly proved in the work carried on at Urtas, near Solomon's Gardens, where waste land was turned into a very paradise of luxuriant verdure. The willingness of the Jews themselves to earn even scanty wages by hard work, was also shown at a place near Jerusalem called the Industrial Plantation. Here Jews of all ages, including men of learning, glad of any occupation which would maintain them near their beloved city, thankfully labored under the hot sun at building and clearing the ground, receiving in return bare peasants' wages and a bit of bread.

"After operations were fairly started on the plantation," observes Mr. Finn, "I one day, after a hard day's work, rode out towards the land, to see the men return from their labor. They were met coming over the lanes and fields carrying their baskets and tools on their shoulders; a happy troop, very ragged but very happy, singing a chorus in Hebrew, 'We are laborers in the field of Abraham, our father.' My eyes filled with tears as the words came to recollection, 'They shall return to Zion with singing, and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads.'"

A priest's mishap is another incident related by Mr. Finn. On one occasion, while Mr. and Mrs. Finn were exploring in the region of Khan Nakhora, they had their table-cloth spread upon the ground by the roadside, when there came up a portly priest belonging to the Convent of the Savior, beyond Sidon, riding a mule and escorted by a peasant on foot. In attempting to dismount alone, the mule's girth being loose, the saddle turned round, so that the priest tumbled on his head, and lay prostrate, his feet still in the stirrups, unable to move, and in imminent danger of being dragged down the road by the mule. He was rescued by Mr. Finn's cook, who ran up and cut the stirrups off with his sword. The priest felt deeply humiliated, and finding that he was indebted for his rescue to the servant of Protestants, he rode off without a word of thanks.

An interesting circumstance described by Mr. Finn was the first admission of Christians since the recapture of Jerusalem to the Temple Sanctuary. This was granted to Mr. and Mrs. Finn in 1853, and they were allowed to conduct to that hallowed spot the Duke and Duchess of Brabant (now the king and queen of the Belgians), and subsequently the eminent Jewish philanthropist, Sir Moses Montefiore, who, as a British subject, was under the protection of the consul. Of this visit Mr Finn thus wrote: "We were to approach the very interesting, if not awful spot, where the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite had been; the site of King David's altar; the site of Abraham's altar on Moriah; the site of the Holy of Holies; the earthly throne of Divine majesty and presence, the spot where the Veil had been rent in twain. There was a multitude of eager expectants. We passed through a narrow, dark passage, which forms the private entrance to the Sanctuary precincts from the Pasha's residence. On a sudden we emerged into daylight and bright sunshine; and we stood within the Sanctuary, on the smooth scarped rock, cut away about a thousand years before. Here the main body of the Turkish garrison awaited the company. The soldiers were fully armed, and closed around us as we followed the Pasha, who, with the officers in command, led the visitors forward. The innovation was astonishing, and as fanatical Turks regarded it as sacrilege, it was not without its dangers. Not many years before, the resident English mission physician had been attending one of the chief Moslem families in their house, which overlooks the Haram precincts. Out of gratitude they led him a very little way within the gates of the open court, that he might behold, if even only a glimpse, something of the beauty of the Sanctuary. But two of the watchmen espied the intruders, and fiercely rushing upon them with their clubs, they knocked down, not only the English doctor, but the Moslem gentleman who was conducting him, and would have killed both had not help been at hand, and the gate so close by that they could be dragged out of reach by the Hereditary Guardian himself, who was friendly, and who was just in time to save them, though with extreme difficulty."

Departure from Jerusalem and the abandoning of the beneficent work to other hands, became unavoidable in 1863, by the chronic sickness of Mr. Finn. He and his devoted wife quitted the country with poignant regret, but continued residence there would have been fatal to the sufferer. He lived until 1872, and though retired from active life never ceased to take a deep interest in the welfare of "God's chosen people." Since his death Mrs. Finn has devoted her life to the same cause. She became Secretary of the movement for assisting Jews to settle in the Holy Land known as "The Syrian Colonization Fund." During the recent Russian persecution her house was besieged by Russian Jews pleading for help to go to the land of their fathers. Mrs. Finn seemed to be an instrument specially prepared for such a crisis, as during her childhood she had acquired familiar knowledge of both the Russian and Hebrew tongues, and could converse with all who came. The money she distributed from the public fund and her own private purse during that time was enormous.

MISS LYDIA VON FINKELSTEIN.

Many of our readers have already made the acquaintance of Lydia Manasseh von Finkelstein. She resided for several years in this country and lectured in most of our great cities. The father of Miss Finkelstein was a Russian noble, whose sympathies with the people and persistent advocacy of constitutional government brought him into collision with the Czar, and rendered his flight from Russia imperative. He eventually migrated to Syria, and settled in Jerusalem, where his daughter Lydia was born, and where she spent the first eighteen or twenty years of her life. There in "The City of the Great King" she herself lived the life she now graphically describes in her lectures, in many of its modes.

A few years ago Miss Finkelstein left the Holy Land and settled in the United States, and here she was led to consecrate herself to the important work in which she is now engaged. Atheists of the lowest type, full of coarse conceit and noisy bluster, and trading, as is their wont, on the ignorance of the masses, were publicly attacking the Bible, and by distortion and misrepresentation were laboring to destroy all confidence in its accuracy. They openly asserted that its descriptions of places and persons, manners and customs of the East, were fallacious, and from this argued that no faith could be placed in its revelations of moral and spiritual truth. To counteract these falsehoods, Miss von Finkelstein felt moved to inform American audiences of such details of Eastern life, derived from her own personal experience and knowledge, as would place the Bible in its true light, and thus destroy the ground on which the infidel attack was made.

Her lectures were exceeding vivid as commentaries on Biblical themes, for she had brought with her the wardrobe she and her brother used in the Holy Land, and at her lectures her brother wore the dress of the Bedouin, or the country shepherd, or the city man, as the case might be; while she herself personified representatives of each of the different classes. The lectures were delivered in many parts of the States to large audiences, and were highly appreciated.

In the summer of 1887 Miss von Finkelstein revisited the Holy Land and collected new facts respecting it and its Jewish settlers. She has now embodied these in new lectures showing how marvellously God is preparing the way for Jewish nationalization in Palestine, and is delivering them in the chief cities of Europe. The influence is very beneficial in arousing public interest in the Jewish people and enlisting public sympathy in their exiled condition.

RIPLEY, Ill.

Dear Restitution:

I have been requested to write to let the brethren know that we have a few believers in the one faith of the gospel in Ripley, Brown Co., Ill. Some twenty years ago we had quite a flourishing congregation. But grievous wolves entered in and scattered the flock until there are but a few left. Some moved away, some joined the Disciples (or Campbellites), some became careless and neglected to attend meetings, while death claimed some of our best members. The few that were left have struggled hard to keep up meetings among the scoffs of the opposing sects. We feel able and willing to give a thus saith the Lord for all the truths we hold and teach. We were favored with a visit from Brother John Foore, of Galesburg, Kan. He delivered fifteen discourses to large and attentive audiences. The brethren and friends to the cause of truth were edified and encouraged, while our opponents opposed and misrepresented us. Brother Foore is a workman that needeth not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth, presenting it in a plain and forcible manner, so that he having ears might hear and understand. There were six willing souls put on Christ by baptism, one reclaimed, and some others purpose being baptized in the near future; and my prayer is that they may walk worthy of the high calling with which they are called. I have been a reader of THE RESTITUTION since its first publication; that is evidence of the estimation I put upon it. It is the best exponent of our views of any paper we are acquainted with. Its weekly visits are looked for with pleasure and we take delight in perusing most of the articles therein. Through it we get the best that is written on the restitution of all things spoken of by all the holy prophets since the world began. Also the signs indicating the near approach of the end of Gentile times. We hope that our worthy brother and Editor may be blessed with health to continue in the good work. Your brother in hope of eternal life when Jesus comes,

HIRAM BOWMAN.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 16.

RIGHTEOUSNESS.

(Uprightness, justice, godliness; to be right, just)

Golden Text: "For I say unto you, except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." Matt. 5, 20.

Lesson Chapter, Psalm 4.

All God's commandments, words and ways are righteousness. Psalm 119, 172; Psalm 145, 17.

He requires his children to be like himself, "sanctify yourselves, and be ye holy." Lev. 20, 7; John 15, 3; 18, 17, 19; Acts 15, 9; 1 Peter 1, 15-20; this holiness must be perfect. 2 Cor. 7, 1; Heb. 12, 14.

Q. What made Abraham a righteous man?

A. He believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness. Gen. 15, 6; Rom. 4, 3, 13, 16, 23; Gal. 3, 6.

Faith, without works is dead, being alone. James 2, 17. Abraham's faith, wrought with his works, and by works, faith was made perfect. James 2, 23.

Abraham kept God's commandments and statutes, Gen. 26, 5; if we would be righteous, we must keep his commandments. 1 John 2, 4-6; 3, 7.

Q. How can we attain unto righteousness?

A. But God be thanked that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness....for as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness, unto holiness. Rom. 6, 16-19.

Q. What are the fruits of righteousness?

A. James 3, 17; Gal. 5, 22.

Q. What is the reward of righteousness?

A. Rom. 6, 22, 23; Rom. 5, 21.

Q. How long will the reward of the righteous endure?

A. The righteous shall inherit the land and dwell therein forever. Psa. 37, 29, 28. For the righteous shall dwell in the land and the perfect shall remain in it. Prov. 2, 21; Psa. 55, 22; 52, 1. The righteous shall never be removed, but the wicked shall not inherit the earth. Prov. 10, 30.

Summing up the lesson we find that to attain unto the righteousness that God requires, there must be faith, we must believe God; secondly, there must be obedience, we must keep God's commandments, the form of doctrine must be obeyed from the heart.

God has given us a system of truth whereby to purify our lives; our lesson tells us that we are purified and sanctified by the word, or through the truth.

We have had lessons on Faith, on Repentance, on Baptism and on Justification. We believe, we repent, we obey from the heart, we are justified, and thus are accounted righteous in God's sight, and if we persevere in the service of righteousness, will "inherit the land and dwell therein forever."

THE UNANSWERED PRAYER.

"Lord, who am I, that thou shouldst call
Thy servant to a task so great?
Forgotten in my low estate,
I, void of wisdom, power, and all
The needs that on such service wait.

"The people know not who thou art;
They would not heed my prayers or tears;
A fugitive full forty years,
Within the lonely desert's heart,
How could I move their hopes or fears?

"I am not eloquent. My speech
Is slow, my tongue is shorn of grace,
I dare not take the prophet's place
Without the prophet's power to reach
The heart of a despairing race.

"Send whom thou will I all excuse is thine;
Thou canst fulfill thy act decree
Through other hands more meet to be
Ephemeris in thy so vast design:
But, Lord, beseech thee, send not me!"

Had Moses failed to go, had God
Granted his prayer, there would have been
For him no leadership to win,
No pillared fire, no magic rod,
No wonders in the land of Zin,

No smiting of the sea, no tears
Ecstatic shed on Sinai's steep,
No Nebo, with a God to keep
His burial! Only forty years
Of desert watching with his sheep!

THE PERSONAL RETURN.

We have a certain number of texts given to us in connection with this subject, that seems to me to be most admirably chosen. But to these passages I venture to add two more to which I would direct your attention. In 2 Tim. iv. 8, Paul writes, "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." What day is that? It is the day spoken of as "that day" throughout the whole of the New Testament, that day towards which the whole world has been hastening from the first hour of its creation, that day when Christ shall come and claim his own. But what more? "Not to me only, but unto all those also that love his appearing." Now I turn to my Greek concordance and find that this word epiphania (the epiphany) is used six times in the New Testament, and every one of these six times the word refers to our Lord's second coming. Now, we remember at the epiphany of Christ, his first coming, when he came in person, he was revealed in different ways to wise men of the Gentiles and others. There are different revelations of Christ, but the same word is used in the New Testament, not referring to that epiphany but to the epiphany when he shall appear again in triumph.

Now one other verse, from Heb. ix. 28; "Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." The second time: then what was the first time? It was a personal appearing, and it will be personal the second time. The first time without sin for the purpose of taking away sin, "for he made him to be sin for us who knew no sin;" but the second time without sin (sin offering) unto the fulfilment of the complete salvation of his people, the church. The sign of those for whom Christ's coming will be the glorious some of their salvation is this: "Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." To them that wait for him, as it is in the Revised Version. Wait! The idea occurs to me: Do we wait for his coming in the body? I never wait for anybody in my house. They are there in my room, they are there with me. But when friends are coming, perhaps by invitation, by previous arrangement, sometimes one has to wait for them, look for them, looking out at the window, saying, "Are they coming?" But when they are present I do not do that. Christ is now with us spiritually. We know the words "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the age." Yes, he is here in our midst by the power of his Spirit. What, then, do we look for? What do we wait for? If it be only a spiritual coming, he is here spiritually now. He is here teaching us to look for and wait for that glorious moment when he shall come again and we shall see him as he is.

For what do we look? For something vague and indefinite? No; but that the Master will soon come into the harvestfield and say, "The day's work is over; come home, my child; the struggle is over; come to the feast, the joyous feast, and you shall struggle no more." He is coming to give us work though. We shall work then for Christ, and serve him fully. How? As disembodied spirits? I think not. I believe these bodies shall rise again, and that Christ in his body will appear. Yes, these bodies have not done their best for Christ yet; they are often hangers-on. God made the body, and it shall be glorified, sanctified, and some day or other become the means of serving him perfectly. These wretched bodies seem indeed to be tormenting and hindering us now in many ways. Then they shall be free from all that, and be used for the Master's service. Look at our limbs, and remember they are to be sanctified in the end; every hand, every head sanctified when he cometh, and used for him. Yes, he is coming that all this may be done.

He cometh to rule the earth, for it is Christ's world. I know that he speaks of Satan upon three occasions as "the prince of this world." He is the prince of this world, but Christ is coming to overturn him. Christ is to have the pre-eminence, Christ is to rule the whole world. He is to have the whole power. He has not got it now. People may talk as they like, but he does not rule over it all. I know Satan cannot go beyond Christ's commands now, but Christ is coming in his glory to rule over the whole earth. If this is to be only a spiritual coming, what is that glory in which Isaiah seems to revel when he speaks again and again of Christ reigning, and of all owning him from the least to the greatest?

What do we gather from the Word of God about Christ's coming? Well, first of all, it is the hope of the church at all times. You may as distinctly mark upon the page of the history of the church of Christ the times of true revival by their expectation of the personal coming of Christ, as you may mark upon a map the cholera places where cholera has been cured or alleviated at any time. I believe the bright times in the history of the church of Christ in these eighteen hundred and eighty years have been when she has been looking for the Lord's Second Advent. Some people refuse to acknowledge this, but laugh at you for having such a hope. Age after age, just when praying people like you here at Millbury, have been gathered together looking for his coming, they have been scorned, and it has been said, This is madness. The Bible says that there shall be scoffers, those who shall say, "Where is the promise of his coming?"

I turn to Heb. ix., and there I find the declaration that the saints of the Old Testament died in the faith, not having received the promise, but still they looked for it, and Christ came at last just at the right time. Simeon and Anna saw him. The saints looked for a personal coming, and they rejoiced. Just so the church has since then had times of revival, marked by distinctive looking for the personal coming of Christ. In the midst of all the darkness and sadness, and frightful depression, perhaps more spiritual than commercial at the present time, there is one glad and glorious thought, that the children of God are alive to the fact, and are looking for the Lord's coming.

The Bible is not a book written to deceive; it is written to guide and teach us; it is the brightness amidst the darkness and the gloom. But there was no book ever written which is so deceitful as the Bible if the Lord's coming is not personal. I dare not preach another sermon from this book if it does not mean what it says. "If I go away I will come again and receive you unto Myself; that where I am there ye may be also." The church of Christ should ever keep her eye fixed upon this her great hope; not the hope of the gradual civilization of the world, for that will not be accomplished till he come.

Jesus is a Person to be expected, loved, obeyed, and trusted. I remembered reading in the life of General Havelock, that great and noble Christian hero, that at one time, when he was here in London with his son, he took him about with him, and on one occasion, having some business where he could not take his boy, he told him to go somewhere else and then wait for him on London Bridge. The boy was trained to obedience, but the General, occupied with many things, forgot the boy. Having finished his work, he went home and sat down to dinner. He asked, "Where is my boy?" "Not at home." "Where is he then?" "He went out with you." Then it flashed into General Havelock's mind that he had forgotten all about the boy, and that his son would be walking up and down on the bridge, shivering with the cold probably. The father went out and found the boy there. Well, our Master has told us to go there to fill that post or this, to occupy that position of humiliation it may be, or to do that work so exceedingly unpleasant to us. We must go and stay there where he tells us. But we are not forgotten.

Dear friends, waiting may sometimes seem very long. As we stand upon the bridge of this world the streams of people pass by who know not him for whom we wait—they pass by some to pleasure, some to sin, and some to business—but they care not for whom we wait. Yet still we keep our waiting watch there, longing for his return. Hold on, Christian, keep that hope bright, it will keep you warm when the world is very cold; it will sustain you when you are very weary and cast down. The trumpet shall sound, and he shall come with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."—F. A. C. Lillingston, in Prophetic News.

THE SEVENTH-DAY. No. 12.

[Copyrighted, 1887.]

MODERN FALSE PROPHETS.

Mrs. White is only one of a large number who, in modern times, have claimed to have Divine revelations. Each has found zealous followers. Let us briefly notice a few.

1. Swedenborg. He was born in Stockholm, Sweden, in 1688 and died in 1772. His father was a nobleman of high standing. Hence Swedenborg was highly educated and moved in the highest society. He traveled extensively, and conversed with the most learned men of the age. The king appointed him to a high office, which he filled with great acceptance for over thirty years. He rose to great eminence in science and wrote seventy-seven books, covering every branch of science. He was a favorite of the king and royal family. He was of the purest character and devoutly religious.

At the age of fifty-five he began to have visions of heaven, hell, angels, and the spiritual world. He says: "I have been called to a holy office by the Lord himself, who most mercifully appeared to me, his servant, in the year 1743, when he opened my sight into the spiritual world and enabled me to converse with spirits and angels." Exactly like Mrs White's claims. This work he continued for about thirty years, and wrote about thirty inspired volumes. He made most remarkable predictions, which were exactly fulfilled.

He founded a new religion based upon his revelations. The Bible is sacredly held to as well as all Christian truth. This church has steadily increased, till it has societies in all parts of the world and in the leading languages. They publish three weeklies, five monthly journals, and one quarterly, besides many books. He got the start of Mrs. White just one hundred years. His followers believe in him just as implicitly as hers do in her. In many respects both moves are much alike. The above is condensed from Schaff-Herzog's Encyclopedia.

2. Mrs. Joanna Southcott. She was born in England in 1750, of poor parents, and was wholly uneducated. She worked as a domestic servant till over forty years of age. She joined the Methodists in 1790. In 1792 she announced herself as a prophetess, and "published numerous (over sixty) pamphlets setting forth her revelations." (Johnson's Cyclopedia, article "Southcott.") She had trances the same as Mrs. White does, and announced the speedy advent of Christ. See Encyclopedia Americana, article "Southcott." She carried on a lucrative trade in the sale of her books. Strange as it may appear, many learned ministers believed in her, and thousands joined her followers, till in a few years they numbered upwards of one hundred thousand! She made many predictions, which her followers claimed were fulfilled. "The faith of her followers, among whom were several clergymen of the established church, rose to enthusiasm." (Encyclopedia Americana, article, Southcott.") The following I quote from Schaff-Herzog's Cyclopedia, article, "Sabbatharians." She "regarded herself as the bride of the Lamb, and declared herself, when sixty-four years of age, pregnant with the true Messiah, the 'second Shilo,' who she would bear Oct. 19, 1814. She surrounded herself with prophets, and in order to prepare the way for the new dispensation, ordered the strictest observance of the Jewish law and Sabbath. A costly cradle was kept in readiness for the Messiah, and for a long time she waited for his birth. At last a supposititious child was declared to be he. But the fraud was detected.... Joanna died in her self-delusion, Dec. 27, 1814; but her followers, who at one time numbered a hundred thousand, continued till 1831 to observe the Jewish Sabbath." "A post mortem examination showed that she had been suffering from dropsy." (Johnson's Cyclopedia.) "Death put an end to both her hopes and her fears. With her followers, however, it was otherwise; and, though for a time confounded by her decease, which they could scarcely believe to be real, her speedy resurrection was confidently anticipated. In this persuasion many lived and died, nor is her sect extinct." (Encyclopedia Americana, article "Southcott.") See also almost any cyclopedia.

Let candid people consider these facts. This movement occurring only thirty years before Mrs White's work, was almost exactly like the present seventh day Adventist move. An illiterate woman is the leader. She has visions, writes numerous pamphlets and revelations, predicts the speedy advent of Christ, and says that the Jewish Sabbath must be kept. Her honesty is plainly manifest; her enthusiasm and that of her followers is great. In a short period one hundred thousand accept her "testimonies" and keep the seventh day. The present seventh day Adventist move is small and feeble compared to that. After forty-three years effort they number less than one-third as many.

And here notice the terrible tenacity of fanaticism when once started. When Joanna died we would have supposed that all sane persons would have given it up; but not a bit of it. They fix it up some way and go right on, and there they are now. So with the followers of Mrs. White. No matter what blunders or failures she makes, they fix it up some way and go right on. They still do it after she is dead and gone.

3. Ann Lee and the Shakers. These are so well known in America that I need say but little about them. Ann Lee, their leader, was born in England, in 1736, died, 1784. Like Mrs. White, "she received no education." She joined a society who were having remarkable religious exercises, and soon began "to have visions and make revelations," which, just like Mrs. White, she called "testimonies." "Henceforth she claimed to be directed by revelations and visions." (Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia, article "Ann Lee.") She was accepted as leader and as "the second appearing of Christ." Like Mrs. White, she required a "peculiar kind of dress," "opposed war and the use of pork" (Johnson's Cyclopedia, article "Shakers.") They have no intercourse with other churches; are renowned for their purity and devotion. They number about 8,000. A careful comparison shows many points of similarity between Mrs. Lee and Mrs. White. The main evidence upon which Adventists rely for proof of Mrs. White's inspiration is the purity of her life and the high moral and religious tone of her writings. They say her revelations must either be of God or Satan. If of Satan, they would not teach such purity and holiness. The same reasoning will prove Mrs. Lee also as a true prophetess, for she exceeds Mrs. White in this line, so that "Shaker" has become a synonym for honesty. Adventists, please note this point.

4. Joseph Smith and the Mormons. This prophet and his visions and revelations are so well known that I mention them briefly. Smith was born in 1805, and died in 1844, the year before Mrs. White began her revelations. He came out in a great religious awakening, as Mrs. White did in the Advent move of 1843–4. In 1833 he also began to have "visions" and "revelations" and see angels. The second advent of Christ was at hand, he said, hence the name, "Latter Day Saints." His mission was to introduce "the new dispensation." They are the "saints," and all other churches are "heathen," or Gentiles. So Mrs. White's followers are the saints; all other churches are "Babylon" and apostate.

The proof of their inspiration beats Mrs. White all to pieces. They work many miracles, as the Adventists themselves own; have the gift of tongues, and can show many predictions strikingly fulfilled. I have met them frequently, seen Smith's son, and know them well. They have increased ten times as fast as the Adventists. They also have a Bible, a new revelation, have started a new sect, and will have nothing to do with others, but proselyte from all.

So Mrs. White, with her revelations, is only one of many similar movers of late. One fact, which I know to be a fact, has impressed me deeply. It is this: A person who has once fully accepted the doctrines of any one of these modern religions, is as a general rule forever spoiled for anything else. Once a Swedenborgite, or a Shaker, or a Mormon, or a seventh day Adventist, and they are that forever; or else they go into unbelief and are nothing. The exceptions are few. The reason is, because they have first had their confidence in everything else destroyed. Then, when it is shaken in their new faith, they have nowhere to go. Doubt and infidelity are the result. That a few years will bring this fearful catastrophe to the followers of Mrs. White, I feel certain.

MRS. WHITE'S MISTAKES.

I will give only a few of her mistakes, enough to show that she is a failure.

1. The shut door. After the time passed in 1844, seventh day Adventists believed that probation had ended, that there was no more salvation for sinners. Elder Butler confesses that this is so. (See Review and Herald, March 4, 1858.) Mrs. White believed this and had a revelation saying so, and here it is: "The reformations that were shown us were not reformations from error to truth, but from bad to worse; for those who professed a change of heart had only wrapped about them a religious garb, which covered up the iniquity of the wicked heart. Some appeared to have been really converted, so as to deceive God's people, but if their hearts could be seen they would appear as black as ever. My accompanying angel bade us look for the travail of soul for sinners as used to be. I looked, but could not see it, for the time for their salvation is past." (Present Truth," page 22, published August, 1848).

They may quibble over this till they die, but there it stands against her, plain enough to any candid man.

2. Slaves. In 1848 she foretold what would happen when Jesus comes, and said: "I saw the pious slave rise in triumph and victory and shake off the chains that bound him, while his wicked master was in confusion." ("Experience and Views," p. 43). But now there are no slaves. She had not then dreamed of the abolition of slavery.

3. Nations angry. "The nations are now getting angry." ("Early Writings," p. 39.) That was thirty-eight years ago. It takes a long time for them to get fighting mad! Pshaw!

4. Another mistake. "Some are looking too far off for the coming of the Lord." (Page 48.) That was thirty-eight years ago, and no Adventist then looked for time to last ten years.

5 Another blunder. "The time for Jesus to be in the most holy place was nearly finished." (Page 49.) Jesus went there in 1844. Hence, he had then been there six years. She saw that the time for him to be there was nearly finished, but it has continued thirty-eight years since. A false prediction, as any one can see.

6 A few months only in 1849. "Now time is almost finished, and what we have been years [six years] learning, they [new converts] will have to learn in a few months." (Page 57). But instead of a few months they have had thirty-eight years!

7. She broke the Sabbath for eleven years. Though she had vision after vision about the Sabbath, yet for eleven years they all began it at six p. m. instead of at sunset, as the law requires, Lev. xxiii. 32. When they found their mistake, she saw it, too, in vision. She says: "I inquired why it had been thus that at this late date we must change." ("Testimony No. 1," p. 13) A poor leader she.

8. Occasionally, when prominent men have left them, she has ventured to predict immediate destruction to them. In 1855 she predicted this of Elder Stephenson (Testimony No. 1," p. 15), and in 1862 of Moses Hull ("Testimony No. 10," p. 457.) But both have lived and grown fat under it!

9. The rebellion. Her predictions about the war alone are enough to destroy all confidence in her revelations. Here are short samples: "Slavery.... is left to live and stir up another rebellion." ("Testimonies," Vol. I. p. 256. Has proved false. "It seemed impossible to have the war conducted successfully." (Page 256.) Yet it was. "When England does declare war....there will be general war." (Page 259.) England did not declare war at all! "Had our nation remained united, it would have had strength; but divided it must fall." (Page 260.) It was not divided nor did it fall. "It looked to me like an impossibility now for slavery to be done away." (Page 266.) Yet it was.

I could give scores of such quotations all through her writings, showing how they have failed always and everywhere; but I will close. I pity her and I pity those who are being misled by her. That it is a fearful delusion I feel certain, but it will have to run its course like other delusions.

Report of Annual Meeting.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God, met according to announcement in THE RESTITUTION at the House of the Brethren, Winchester, Va. And as we prepared a somewhat lengthy report soon after the meeting and sent it on for publication, with a remittance of some money, which seems to have shared the fate of the man in the gospel, going from Jerusalem to Jericho, in order to a regular succession of such meetings, I will just condense the original manuscript. It was said frequently by the brethren and sisters present that it was the best meeting we ever had. The usual modes of reasoning were debased from the form of sound words, by the writer, for the edification of the dear ones assembled, which was listened to with intense interest by a well filled house of the citizens of the town and country, among whom was the present mayor of the city, for the purpose as he said, first to show his respect for the meeting and also to see that there was good order during the services. The ex-mayor, J. B. F. Reed, formerly an Episcopalian minister, says now he will stand up for the truth regardless of what men may say or do, and joined us in an humble proclamation of the word, much to the edification of the Assembly.

On Sunday evening all seemed to get a crumb from the Master's table by partaking of the memorial feast, and all the more was the occasion a feast of fat things, as there were some present who since our last meeting had been led to the "Rock that is Higher than I," by changing their relationship from the First to the Second Adam, that Lord from heaven a quickening Spirit, that we had the happy privilege, while singing one of the sweet songs of Zion of receiving into our full fellowship in the all-saving name of the anointed one. May they ever be mindful of their covenant, so as to hold fast the beginning of the confidence of rejoicing firm unto the end, that they with all the ransomed ones receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

On Monday, the reading of letters from the brethren and sisters of like precious faith from different parts of the habitable, which was commenced on Saturday, was finished. This is always one of the most enjoyable features of these assemblies, as they enlarge our borders and strengthen our stakes, and make our hearts all aglow with heavenly union.

THE BUSINESS PHASE OF THE MEETING.

1. The decision of the Assembly was that we fall in line with the brethren of other States, by holding State Conferences, so if a National Conference be held we may be in order to send delegates to the same.

2. That our beloved brother, N. J. Morgan, visit all of the churches in East and West Virginia, in order to consult them with regard to the time and place of holding State Conferences and of sending delegates thereto.

The meeting closed on Monday night by the usual farewell greeting mingled with a song of praise to the giver of every good and perfect gift, that we had been thus blessed in sitting together once more as it were in heavenly places, and to have a foretaste of that glorious day, when the saints of all ages will assemble together, and being overcomers, participate together of the hidden manna or the Tree of Life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God, and live forever in a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

COMING LORD TO THEE.

My years are but a span,
My time is passing by;
My life, oh, Lord! is in thy hand,
The end, who knows how nigh.

CHORUS:
I am coming Lord, coming Lord to thee,
Help me by thy precious word
To put my trust in thee.

When I [illegible] my race,
And time with me is no more,
Oh, let me find a hiding place
On that celestial shore.

Then on this earth renewed,
With Jesus for my King,
I hope to join the heavenly hosts,
And praises loud we'll sing.

We then will sing this song,
Oh, death where is thy sting,
Oh, grave where is thy victory,
You could not hold our King.

OBITUARY.

HOCKMAN.—Elizabeth Hockman, wife of Brother Obadiah Hockman, Nov. 17th, 1887, aged 71 years, 11 months and 7 days.

Mother Hockman leaves one son, three daughters and a large family connection, with many dear friends, to mourn her loss. As the religious history of this dear old mother and family will doubtless be of interest to the readers of THE RESTITUTION, we will give it at some future time. We will just add that after reading several portions of the word of God applicable to the occasion, for the comfort and consolation of the bereaved family and friends, we preached the word to a very large and attentive audience from the 16th. chapter of Acts, in which we showed that even death first or second, was an exhibition of the love of God. That notwithstanding man had violated his law, he (God) sent him, the man, forth from the garden of Eden to till the ground, from whence he was taken, and placed at the east of the garden cherubim and a flaming sword which turned every way to keep the way of the tree of life, lest he, the man, put forth his hand and take of the tree of life and eat and live forever in a sin-cursed state, which produces its daily fruit of sorrow, grief and woe. And that was positive proof of the mortality of man. For if he had immortality or an immortal soul, he could have lived forever independent of the tree of life. But Sister Hockman, having seen or learned this great truth, her only hope if she died, of living again was in reaching forth the hand of faith and partaking of the antitypical tree of life, which is the Lord of life and glory. She was baptized by the writer in the all saving name for the remission of sins some twenty odd years ago, and having held fast the beginning of the confidence of rejoicing firm unto the end, she now rests in hope of a glorious immortality, as was sung at her interment from the Psalmodist:

There is a calm for those who weep,
A rest for weary pilgrims found,
They softly lie and sweetly sleep,
In Jesus now low in the ground.

The storm that sweeps the wintry sky,
No more disturbs her deep repose
Than summer evening's latest sigh
That shuts the lily and the rose.

Soon, if renewed by grace divine,
In God's own image from that clay,
Immortal she shall rise and shine,
In glory bright, a star of day.

CHRISTMAS CAROL.

Jesus came, and there was light,
Chasing all the mists of night;
Jesus came and there was love,
Hearts were kindled from above:
Upward soars the living flame—
Glory, glory to his name!

Jesus came in time of need—
Hidden long the promised seed—
Lo! the Bud, the Branch, we see,
Of the ever-living tree:
Blessings on the root and stem—
On the babe of Bethlehem!

Man, created in his mould,
Had a glory sinking cold:
Jesus, born a little child,
Life's immortal morning smiled.
Song and cherubrops and the ray—
Herald of eternal day

Jesus, like the shining sun,
Hath, forth his race to run,
Clouds and shadows intervene,
Veiling for the flowing stream:
But, in midst there is a voice—
"Evermore in him rejoice."

Jesus, Lord, again appear!
Come, our stooping souls to cheer;
We are waiting for the day,
Heavenly Bridegroom, why delay?
"Hope deferred" will ery, "How long Ere the sight be turned to song?"

Jesus—once on earth a child—
Dwells in glory undefiled:
Now in that all bridal sweet:
God in man—O joy exceeding!
Hallelujah! make the chime!
Endless praise to Christ our King!

"The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God." Psa. xiv. 1 and liii. 1.

We see from these words that skepticism is not of modern origin, but it is an ancient error; it existed in the days of King David, and still exists in this nineteenth century. How many are there among us who claim to be wise, are just foolish or simple enough to roll this error under their tongue like a sweet morsel.

Who can deny the existence of a God, when we look around and see the order of nature, how everything works as from the beginning; if 'all things came by chance all would be confusion and anarchy, but now we see all things come after their kind. "The heavens declare the glory of God: and the firmament showeth his handiwork." "O Lord, our Lord, How excellent is thy name in all the earth!"

Not that "old serpent, which (John says) is the devil and Satan," who so successfully deceived our first parents, has been working through his evil spirits, the demons, upon the minds of men, and enticed many to believe, "There is no God." And upon the religious world Satan has been very busy with those who claim to believe there is a God, and influenced many to believe that there is no personal God, but the God they worship is an immaterial spirit. The reason they assign is, Jesus said, "God is a Spirit." Worcester's dictionary defines the word "Spirit" to be "an immaterial substance;" now this seems to be a self contradiction, for a substance is material not immaterial, if God is immaterial, he would be no being at all. Is that not equal to saying, "There is no God?" How can we worship that which is immaterial?

The Bible teaching is, There is a God, and that that God is material. The first Bible proof is the first chapter of Genesis. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." Can that which is not material create anything? In this chapter we read, "And God said" nine times, how can that which is immaterial speak and say something? Once in these nine times, he talked with his co-workers (who these were I know not except they were the angels who kept their first estate), and said to them, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. And God created man in his own image." We see man is a material being, how could he be made in the image of God if God himself is not material? an image is a corporeal representation, and a likeness is a resemblance or a similarity. Man then being composed of corporeal parts, God also must be a bodily being.

Paul in his letter to the Hebrews says, when speking of Jesus, "Who being the brightness of his (God's) glory, and the express image of his person." Revised Version reads, "Who being the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance." (Margin) "the impress of his substance." So Jesus said, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." Therefore, they were both alike in appearance, while one in purpose.

Again Paul says in his letter to the Philippians, "Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God." What is a form but a mould, method, shape, figure, etc. He made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men." So now we see Jesus was made in the likeness of God, and in the likeness of men. Adam was first made in the image or likeness of God, then Jesus the second Adam, the only begotten Son of God, took on him the seed of Abraham. Well did Paul say to Timothy, "God was manifest in the flesh," by "the image of the invisible God," Jesus the Christ.

Surely the above is sufficient to prove that God is a personal God, still he is invisible to the human eye, but Jesus whom he sent has revealed him unto us. With this view before us we feel to have something real to worship, and can realize the promise of our Savior when he said "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." "For now we see through a glass darkly: but then face to face," Paul.

But "the God of this world (Satan) hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." This seems to be the difficulty, our minds are too much blinded, and we yield too much to the popular teaching of the age.

But the question is presented to us, If God is a real tangible personal substance, how can he be a Spirit? In the conversation Jesus held with the woman of Samaria, he said to her "God is a Spirit." If we notice the margin in Revised Version, the article a is left out, which makes it read, "God is Spirit." Is it necessary that because God is Spirit, he should not be a personal being? not at all. It is true that when Jesus appeared to his disciples at night after he was raised from the dead, they thought they had seen a Spirit, (a frightful apparition) But Jesus said unto them, "See my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit (apparition) hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." It was Jesus himself, but he was no longer a natural man, he was not now supported by blood as he was before his death. He is now a spirit body. Paul says, "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." Still he was a tangible being. He said to his disciples, "Handle me and see," can we handle and see that which is not substance?

The angels to are spirit beings. Paul says, "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to do service for the sake of them that shall inherit salvation?" P. V.

As to the form of those heavenly messengers, they so much resembled men, that when they appeared to Abraham as he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day, Abraham ordered his servant to fetch water to wash their feet, he killed a calf and dressed it, and his wife (Sarah) made bread or cakes, and with butter and milk "they did eat." Abraham addressed one of them as his Lord, the others are called angels in the next chapter.

And again. At the resurrection of Jesus, Matthew says, "An angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and rolled away the stone, and sat upon it." And John says, "And she (Mary) beholdeth two angels in white, sitting, one at the head, and one at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain." These angels are what Paul called ministering spirits. And they so resemble men, that Mark says, "And entering into the tomb, they saw a young man sitting on the right side, arrayed in a white robe." And Luke's record is, "behold two men stood by them in shining garments." So we see that the angels of God in heaven, are material spirit beings.

In the regeneration, at the coming of the "Lord Jesus Christ, who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation," "and this mortal shall have put on immortality," then all such will become spirit beings, "and partakers of the divine nature."

So when we hear such mythological doctrine from the lips of eloquent theologians, as that God is not a material being, can we wonder at the skeptic coming to the conclusion "There is no God?" For Satan is continually busy by his demoniac power to derange the minds of men, and entice them to deny the existence of their Creator. Paul forewarned us of this, that in the later times, speaking of some, "giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons." And again he said, "Evil men and impostors shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived."

As the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles because of the inconsistency of the Jews. (See Romans ii. 24.) so the popular teachers among us may lead their hearers astray in their attempts to disprove a personal God.

A careful study of the book of nature, should convince a man that there is a God. But when we meditate upon the Bible, there we learn of his attributes, and of his long suffering toward them who say, "There is no God."

J. B. Cox.

[We know nothing of the inherent nature of either matter or Spirit. While each has its peculiar qualities and attributes there is an immense—if not an infinite—difference between the two. The Scripture is positive in its teaching that "God is Spirit," and we rest our faith in this revelation. Personality and Materiality are not convertible terms. Personality is the idea we suppose that the writer would make prominent.—Ed. Res.]

BIBLE vs. FABLES.

"I charge thee, therefore, before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom; preach the word: be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine. For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables." 2 Tim. iv. 1-4.

As such a wide divergence existed between the word of God and fables in the apostle's day, and the same is true at the present day, and of course will continue until the "last syllable of recorded time," for there can be no affinity between them. Christianity is not of spontaneous growth, but it is like wheat, previous to the sowing; and growth of which the fallow ground must first be broken up; its growth comes by dint of hard labor; the seed must not be sown among thorns, for they too often choke the word, the seed, so as to render it unfruitful. Tares (as schollars and oriental travellers tell us) are a kind of grain that resembles wheat in its early stage, and is often mistaken for the same, and if so, then we can the more readily see the significance and propriety of Christ's interdiction as to the rooting up of the tares until the time of the harvest, for then the characters represented by the wheat and tares, would be like "living epistles, known and read of all men."

Fables, a counterfeit Christianity, and tares which greatly resemble wheat, are plants indigenous to every variety of soil and climate; very hardy, and flourishing alike wherever the foot of man has ever trod; in the snowy cliffs of Greenland, the sun-burnt plains of Africa, the rugged mountains of Norway, or the fertile fields of Italy; on the banks of the Ganges or the Mississippi, whether we inhale the zephyrs wafted from the groves of the Arabian spices, or shiver beneath the blasts of Patagonia's wilds, the same traits remain intact. When they are not of spontaneous growth, they will readily spring up in uncultivated or poorly cultivated wheat or corn fields. It is an old adage, that "nature abhors a vacuum." Lack of tillage or poor tillage, invites thorns, thistles or noxious weeds to fill this empty space. These very fitly symbolize fables, or any system of false religion or spurious Christianity.

The fables which the apostle foresaw would spring up as a result of a neglect of preaching or expounding of the word, were in his day only in their incipiency; as the mystery of iniquity had already in his day began to work or develop, and by the aid of the telescope of faith he foresaw the finale, or the culmination of the career of the man of sin, the son of perdition, (unmistakably the Pope of Rome as the head of the mother church.) "He shall be consumed with the spirit of his (Christ's) mouth, and shall be destroyed by the brightness of his coming. History, up to date, corroborates or tallies exactly with the prediction. Fables had their origin in paganism, as they constitute the chief factor of that system of religion. Modern spiritism, or better known as spiritualism, is but a second edition of ancient necromancy, which is defined by Webster, "the art of communicating with the dead by means of a pretended revelation; the art of magic, conjuration, etc," all of which is the legitimate outcropping from another pagan dogma, viz: the dual or double entity of man—soul and body. The Catholics improved on this dogma and got up a second edition of the same, and established a purgatory, the invocation of saints, etc. And the Protestants have got a third edition—they have copied the climax in the case of Old John Brown. We believed the good old man died a martyr to the down-trodden slave, but according to the lines of their favorite hymn,

"Old John's body lies mouldering in the grave, While his soul goes marching on."

If the soul, which according to their idea, is the man proper, then, on that hypothesis, he is not yet dead, and, as a consequence, his martyrdom is a misnomer, or a farce. The spiritualists proper, or those who are not ashamed to stand up, and be counted openly, honestly and above board say, that there is no such thing as death; what men call death, say they, is but the mortal struggle for immortality. The above is a fair sample of the inscriptions which are found on all their tombstones.

It is only a question of time when all who believe in the dual nature of man, and the inherent immortality of the soul (the man proper) which virtually robs Christ, the second Adam, of conferring immortality or eternal life by a resurrection from the dead, for the reason already assigned, viz: that there can be no such thing as death on their hypothesis. Death is defined as a cessation of all the vital functions; not only have they ceased to act, but they have lost the susceptibilities of renewed action. By accepting this fable, it not only denies the conviction of our own corporeal senses (the only medium by which knowledge on any given question is acquired). We can reason on any or all questions or subjects in the same proportion as our senses take cognisance; and we can go no farther. Our senses are in perfect accord and in unison with the Scriptural account of man in death. "The dead know not anything." See Eccl. x. 5. "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence," said the Psalmist. "The living (not the dead) shall praise thee, as I do this day," said good old Zedekiah. But there is no need of further citation from the Scriptures, as their concurrent testimony is to the same effect. Space forbids going farther on this head.

But I can hardly forbear saying a few words with regard to one other popular fable, which, if carried to its logical sequence, subverts Christ's mission and work, viz: the post millennial advent of Christ, and it necessarily carries with it the previous conversion of the world to Christ, which plainly contradicts God's own words, to cut nothing of Paul's testimony, and also of all the holy prophets.

First, Christ's testimony. "As it was in the days of Noah so shall it be at the coming of the Son of man." How was it at that time? Ripe for destruction. See Gen. vi.

Secondly, Paul's testimony. The text at the head of this essay, also chapter iii. entire. "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come." The balance of the chapter shows the recklessness of the people at that epoch; at the very time our friends vainly imagine that the world is to be converted by the preaching of the gospel. But run and Romanism, if they are not completely counteracting the missionary work, are greatly retarding the same. The missionary work is in obedience to Christ's commission to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." The rewards to the believer and the condemnation to the unbeliever, presupposes that not all will believe, so no umbrage can be taken from the commission that all the world will be converted. The gospel is a sufficient motive power of itself, without any extraneous or superadded motives for its prosecution.

Thirdly, the prophet Daniel, without going into, shows conclusively the decadence, depreciation and the deterioration of the four kingdoms which precede the fifth, or the kingdom of God. The analysis of the symbols employed by the prophet to illustrate the characteristics and the different phases of these four kingdoms. In the metallic image chap. ii. is shown the depreciation from gold down to potter's clay. In chap. vii. the deterioration is from the noble lion to the nondescript, and terrible beast. These kingdoms will be converted by the smiting process—the constituents to be broken to pieces by the stone (symbol of Christ) which is to become a great mountain and fill the whole earth. Let this kingdom speedily come! M. J. Lewis.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "8" and reads "Jny8" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1888. "Feb" February, "Mar" March "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

"The Gospel of Our Salvation and Kindred doctrines—or Life only through Christ—Resurrection of the dead—Second coming of Christ—The Kingdom of God, etc., will be faithfully preached every Sunday morning at 10:30 a. m., after dinner truth! This service will close at 11:30, after which the church will meet for conference, "breaking of bread and prayers." 108 Grand st., on first floor, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Contains the Original Greek text of the New Testament, with an interlineary word-for-word English translation, based on new renderings of eminent critics, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscripts, together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references.
The different renderings of various passages in the New Testament are the foundations on which most of the sects of Christianity here have built up; with this work each reader may judge for himself whether the words there literally translated are so arranged in the common version as to express the exact meaning of the New Testament writers.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Weethee.
This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar homes, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.
THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.
It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.
In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to cause preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Uncompromising Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.
It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1.00. Send to this office for the work.

The Eastern Question
In its various phases.—Egyptian, British, Russian, Bulgarian, Hebrew, Armenian, and Mussulmanic, by J. P. Weethee. The subject as a whole, and in its different divisions is handled in a masterly manner, and the reader is convinced at once that the author has spared no labor in the study of his topics. The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 640 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $1.00. Send to this office; orders will now be promptly filled. As we have received an invoice of the book, and will send direct from here. The two books, "Coming Age" and "Eastern Question" if ordered together, $1.60.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, JANUARY 11, 1888. NO. 2.

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS { One Year . . $2.00. Six Months . . 1.00. Three Months . .50.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the remission of sins, and a holy life as essential to final salvation.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD IN CHRIST.—No. 3.

Some insist very strenuously that there is no long space between the resurrection of believers and that of unbelievers, and they ground their belief on 2 Tim. iv. 4, quoting this passage according to the authorized version, and grounding their views on a word which is wrongly translated, although the Revised Version substitutes the correct word, and which indeed was given by Greek scholars before the Revised Version appeared. In King James' Version the passage reads, "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom." Now this does seem to teach, on the surface of the passage, that the judgment both of the living and the dead will take place at the commencement of Christ's reign, and if the judgment, of course, the resurrection, as the latter must precede the former. But it is well known among scholars that this is not the correct translation of the passage. It is said that according to the three oldest manuscripts, the word at should read and. Both Dean Alford and Bishop Elliot adopt the following as the true reading: "I charge thee, therefore, before God and Christ Jesus who is about to judge the quick and the dead, and by his appearing and his kingdom." Dean Alford has taken this translation "from Scholz and Tischendorf; and this, in that part of the passage now under consideration, is exactly the same as that in the Revised Version. Now this reading harmonizes with the obvious meaning of other texts on this subject, and thus preserves the analogy of Scripture.

Again; some speculate and philosophize and refine and bring so much worldly wisdom to the resurrection, that they make of it a re-creation which has really no connection with the body returned to dust. The various growths which spring up from the variety of seeds sown in the earth, bear a close union or relation with those seeds, otherwise Paul's reasoning is fallacious when he says, "Thou foolish one, that which thou thyself sowest is not quickened, except it die." 1 Cor. xv. 36.

The instances of resurrection that have taken place, and are recorded in the Scriptures, serve to throw some light on the resurrection yet to come.

The resurrection of Lazarus was not a new creation, but a recalling to life of the body that had been laid away in the grave. "He that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go." John xi. 44.

In Matthew xxvii. 53, after speaking of the rending of the veil of the temple, and the rending of the rocks, Matthew says, "And many bodies of the saints that had fallen asleep were raised; and coming forth out of the tombs after his resurrection they entered into the holy city and appeared unto many." Now the laws of language demand that we understand this to have been a corporeal resurrection. If it was not a restoration to life of the dead bodies had been put into the tombs, the language is deceptive.

In John v. 28, 29, Christ teaches that all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice, and shall come forth. Such language is misleading if there is not a real resurrection.

If there is no connection between the body that dies and the body that is raised,—if the corruptible body does not form the basis, so to speak, of the incorruptible one,—if it is not the body of humiliation that is raised and fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body, then the phrase in Rev. xx. 13, "And the sea gave up the dead which were in it," is meaningless.

Some greatly mistake the meaning of the term used by the apostle, "a spiritual body." They understand by it a body of the nature of spirit, an ethereal, intangible body, a body that cannot be perceived by the touch. But this ericonity is not the meaning. A spiritual body is a body animated not by blood, but by the Spirit of God, and governed, not by the laws of nature,—the laws of the fleshly nature as we now inherit it,—but by the laws of mind and spirit acting in union with the Holy Spirit. It does not follow that because the resurrection body will be a spiritual body, it will not therefore be a material, tangible body.

Some writers insist that in death the whole man dies, and that in the resurrection the whole man, and not a part of him, is raised from the dead; evidently ignoring the teaching of the wise man, that while the body,—the dust,—returns to the earth as it was, the spirit returns unto God who gave it. They seem also to overlook the following passages which refer particularly to the body as that part of man which comes under the power of death. Rom. viii. 11: "He that raised up Christ Jesus from the dead shall quicken also your mortal bodies." Verse 23: "Waiting for our adoption, to-wit, the redemption of our body." Man, in his tripartite nature consists of spirit and soul and body; and it is the body that is brought under the condemnation of that enemy. Then, these two words, quicken and redemption, mean all that the word resurrection implies. To quicken is to make alive; and the quickening of that part of the man which is mortal will be by the Holy Spirit, who has already made his abode with you. The quickening of your spirit in justification and sanctification, is the pledge and promise of the quickening of your body. The redemption of the body is its deliverance from corruption and the grave. 1 Cor. xv. 53: "For this corruptible must put on incorruption." The apostle had here in his thoughts his own body, that part of himself which was under the law of corruption, but which would be immortalized in the resurrection. Phil. iii. 21: "Who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation." Our body is that part of us which is under the sentence of death as the sequence of Adam's sin, and which is ever liable to suffering by sickness and disease. Thus it is humiliated. But when the Lord Jesus comes from heaven, our bodies shall be fashioned anew and shall "be conformed to the body of his glory."

SILAS HENN.

Dear Restitution:

We are admonished to stir up pure minds by way of remembrance; and only in the interest of what is true, would I suggest a candid, impartial and strictly Biblical looking into the question as to what sort of drink offering are we to offer unto the Lord in the "Lord's Supper" service. From observation, this question has not been before the readers of our paper for a great length of time; and since anything has been said, a new generation has arisen; and some probably have come into the church with a bias, favoring the "strong drink" of Numbers xxviii. 7, while others have come blessed in favor of "the fruit of the vine," Matt. xxvi. 29, and that of an unfermented character! Others again may have come in, who are totally indifferent whether it be one or the other, and have said, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind," a text too often used to gloss over, or cover up, many irregularities in the church!

The real question is, are we at liberty to adopt, or use accommodatingly, measures in accordance with individual judgment, or have we a prescribed form, with associate facts.

We have been closely studying the epistle to the Romans in our Bible Class and have discovered some very practical thoughts therein; and while not new to all, to some they have come with a preciousness of more than ordinary character.

In the 14th chapter there is a liberty and a restraint which is very suggestive, and this it is that has led me to suggest the consideration of the "Supper" service, and if I may further suggest, that you, editorially, present this matter; for I am assured you are competent to this and more too!

I herewith enclose a one-page tract, signed "F. C." I know the author, and as a writer as well as controversialist, in former years, he was well known; he sleeps, I trust, the sleep of the justified, and to his own master he stands or falls! There are those I learn who hold to the views set forth in the leaflet, and whose consciences will not permit them to associate, scarcely, in the same hall, and in no wise to "break bread," and to "drink of the cup," with those whose consciences are even as tender in the behalf, that the cup our Lord gave at the close of the Passover service, was as void of the element of leaven as was the commandment in Exodus xii. 20.

Question. If nothing leavened was to be in all their habitations, and they were not to eat of that which had leaven in it, does it seem reasonable they might have wine in their habitations? for wine is the fermented juice of grapes, quite as much as leaven is ferment in bread dough!

My object is not to discuss this, but to have you, or some one well versed in the Scriptures, and who, when they quote original Hebrew or Greek, know what they are doing! "Flings" or "taunts" at those who conscientiously believe it wrong to use "strong wine," are not arguments, and vice versa. I have heard of some who have not dared to participate in the memorial service because the drink used was strong—admitting it to be wine! which article it is almost impossible to procure in its pure form; adulterations such as were not certainly known under Mosaic law! Therefore, however ridiculous those who may side with the "strong drink offering" may strive to make it appear, it seems to me, in view of what the apostle Paul has said with reference to meats and drinks, we do well to avoid the appearance of evil, by not putting to our brother's lips that which may cause him to stumble, and ultimately fill a drunkard's grave. No more can saying, "Am I my brother's keeper?" with the foregone conclusion, I am not! The language of the blessed Lord and of his selected apostle Paul, is against such conclusion!

GEO. W. YOUNG.

COMMUNION BREAD AND WINE.

"This is my body;" what is his body? He had something in his hand; what was it? Some things we assume; we assume, that when Christ sent the disciples into the city to intimate that he would keep the feast of unleavened bread at the house of a certain one, he sent his disciples to the house of a one who kept the passover according to the law of Moses, not to one who would substitute one thing for another. Therefore, it was unleavened bread he had in his hand when he said: "This is my body," keeping the law of Moses, he could not have anything but unleavened bread in the house. Christ had access to no other. "This (unleavened) bread is my body," etc. With those who think they can take liberties with Christ and place something else in the mouth and hands of Jesus, we have no argument.

"This is my blood;" what is his blood? He had a cup containing something. What? Again we assume that what he had was in accordance with the law; we have no controversy regarding the different kinds of wine mentioned in the Bible, we care not what kind of wine Noah got drunk with, we care not what kind of wine, or how obtained, the King of Babylon or any other King drank, we care not what kind of wine the Savior made out of water, as for total abstinence, we do as the Savior did, ignore it. These are all questions raised to bamboozle and confuse the simple mind. All we want to know is: What was in the cup when our Savior said, "This is my blood." What only could be in it, according to the law of Moses? Again we leave them to their own conceit, who think that to gratify the caprices, and crotchets, and teetotal consciences of the multitude—a little substitution may be indulged in—a little liberty may be taken with the words of the Savior—only a little—grape juice or stewed raisins instead of wine—all will surely agree to this—it is perfectly innocent, and offending the prejudices of none, we shall have peace, harmony, and our seats well filled, etc.

What says the law? turn to Numbers xxviii. 24. "After this manner ye shall offer daily, throughout the seven days, the meat of the sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord: it shall be offered beside the continual burnt offering, and his drink offering."

It may be said that this does not define the kind of wine to be used. Turn to the description of a drink offering, Num. xxviii. 7.

"And the drink offering thereof shall be the fourth part of a hin for the one lamb: in the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the Lord for a drink offering."

Now in conclusion, when it can be shown that grape juice, stewed raisins, or unfermented wine, so-called, is strong wine, then we will be satisfied to adopt these commodities as the article or articles addressed as "This," in the Savior's words, "This is my blood," etc.,—until then we insist that wine is the only article chosen by Jesus to represent his blood. We wait also until it can be shown that the words of a Father Matthew or any other apostle of total abstinence can over rule, alter, or set aside the words of him who spake as never man spake. Until then we insist upon the cup containing the identical article called "This" by our Savior, to wit, wine.—Frank's Coghill.

Editor Restitution:

I would say a few words to you and all the dear children of faith scattered abroad who are readers of THE RESTITUTION that we have read so many years and still prize it above all other religious papers that we have the privilege of reading from time to time. It is the only one we take now and should feel sorry to give it up.

Another year has run its swift race to the ocean of eternity, and carried many millions of mortals to that bourn from whence no traveller returns. Why my poor, unprofitable life has been spared to see a new year, I do not know.

[illegible] from those of "like faith" from week to week amid all the changes, cares and perplexities of this mortal life. There is a little company of believers here in Dover, but we have not been permitted to meet but a part of the time the past year, for Dr. Thomas was away some months and we had but two or three meetings during his absence. I was sick while he was gone and went away to the north to get rid of malaria that was working in my system. I went to my old home in Connecticut and soon recruited.

We meet at Brother Baker's house now, and have quite interesting sessions "searching the Scriptures" in obedience to the Master's command. Dr. Thomas preaches to us once a month. Bro. Baker has not been in the faith but a short time, but he and his wife are firm believers now of the gospel of the kingdom and future life only in Jesus Christ. He has chronic rheumatism, is a cripple, having to use crutches to get about the house, and cannot go out in the winter, and so likes to have the children come to his house and hold meetings. He is a pattern of patience and love, and has been a true friend to us since we came to Dover. Brethren and sisters remember him in your prayers, that he and his companion may have the grace and strength they need in their trying circumstances, and that he may be healed, "if the will of God be so." O, the suffering there is in this earth today, and increasing yearly. There is no deliverance for earth and its groaning inhabitants but in the coming and kingdom of our divine Lord and Savior. Then let us pray with more fervor, "thy kingdom come," than we have ever done.

We have much to encourage us in the tidings from the Holy Land. How can anyone doubt, that "the time to favor Zion" has really come when there is so much of interest transpiring in that land to confirm that prediction. Then the tidings that the Jews are becoming interested in the New Testament and are awaking to life after ages of unbelief and hardness and blindness, and are beginning to believe in him whom as a nation they have so long despised, proves indeed how literally every word spoken by God's prophets will in his own time be fulfilled. I hope we shall hear often from all the household. Let us strive to encourage one another, brethren and sisters, and build each other up. We cannot all see alike or "eye to eye," and never shall till "the Lord brings again Zion." If "charity covers a multitude of sins," it certainly should some "errors." God help us to discern truth and walk in love. Your sister,

"WHAT ADVANTAGE THEN HATH THE JEW?"—No. 2.

You can go back in your own country, you can hunt up the dignitaries that lie sepulchred in their greatness; the men who built castles and the men who lodged in palaces—men who were honored in their times with all the pomp of royal state; but one old tinker from Bedford Jail, shining in the light of God's Word, gives more lustre to his age than ten thousand of them, and will be better known and longer remembered than multitudes of nobles with all their pomp, their wealth, and their splendor, simply because to him was committed the oracles of God—simply because he, gazing through that divine telescope, could see the beauty of the hills of God, and trace the pathway of the children of light until they walked in white in the city of the redeemed.

Take out of the literature of the world today the light that flashes from the Book of God, and how little would remain. Remove from the most precious productions, the most ornate and most beautiful master-pieces of human thought, the gems from God's Word that adorn those coronets that crown the intellect of man, and what is left is simply dead and worthless and vain. Let the teachings of God's Word, the unsightly [illegible] only found in God's Word, be dropped out of your laws, your poetry, your eloquence, and your history, and you would hardly find a book in the English language that would be worth the reading. Your Shakespeare would be a disjointed mass; of your Milton there would be nothing but shreds remaining; your poems, with their soul-stirring power, would simply be a chaos of confused ideas; the words that breathe would breathe no longer, and the thoughts that burn would burn no more, for the light of life would have faded out, and scholars would stand as amid the ruins of an intellectual palace that had been rocked by the earthquakes or riven asunder by thunderbolts.

Now, if it be true that the Bible is at the foundation of our civilization, at the foundadation of our domestic life, and at the foundation of all intellectual and literary eminence; if it be true that this Book, in its influence on mankind, is paramount to all other influences, and is really and truly the voice of God speaking to man's soul, the Holy Spirit describing and recording Divine wisdom for man's benefit, the principles of Truth writing themselves first on the parchments of the prophets and apostles, and next on the hearts of believers, and in the "living epistles known and read of all men;" if it be true that all advantages and blessings, all joy and gladness, all health and happiness come through the knowledge of these oracles of God,—then is it not the duty of Christian men who have this Book, and who look out on the world that perishes for lack of knowledge, on the multitude whose hands have never grasped the light of life, whose eyes have never beheld its brightness,—is it not their duty to scatter it far and wide? It seems to me there can be no question concerning the duty of Christian men under these circumstances:

"Shall we, whose souls are lighted
With wisdom from on high,
Shall we, to men benighted,
The lamp of light deny?
Salvation, O salvation,
The joyful sound proclaim,
Till earth's remotest nation
Shall learn Messiah's name."

And when this Word goes forth, it is of the utmost importance that there go with it the living influence of men who love that Word, and who rejoice in it. There are instances where the Word alone has done its work. There are instances where men simply reading the Book, have been changed by its marvellous power. There are instances where the Book, cast out into the darkness of heathenism, has kindled a flame which has blazed aloft like a beacon on the mountain top.

I recollect hearing of a man in a heathen land who read the Old Testament. It was all he had; all he had ever seen. He read that Book—read it and believed it—and he sought after God in his way, and, as well as he knew how, he tried to serve him. After many years, by some kind providence of God the New Testament came into his hands. Can you imagine what a revelation that was? Familiar with the writings of the prophets, he could read. "Thus it was written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer and to rise from the dead." He could read, "This was done that the Scripture might be fulfilled." He could read of Christ who was the seed of the law, the promised seed of the woman who was destined to bruise the serpent's head; the seed of Abraham, who had come to bless the world; the seed of David, who was born to be a King over all the earth; the Lamb of God, the anti-type of all sacrifices, the Son of God, the Savior of the world. He had before read the first volume of the Book, and now he had found the second; and he said it was as if one who long had been walking in the glimmering starlight, walking in the night with faint beams from above, but who had come at last to see the sun arise and bathe the whole landscape with its glory.

Now, this is just the condition of many a devout Israelite today,—Israelites who keep the law of Moses having much advantage even now over the heathen world, and even over many in Christendom, chiefly because to them are committed the Oracles of God; yet they lack the continuation, the completion of the wondrous story. They lack the words of him who "came not to destroy the law but to fulfil it." They lack the testimony of the apostles to the fulfilment of the words of the prophets. The foundation is only partly laid. The prophets are there, but the apostles are lacking; and upon Jesus Christ, Who is the chief corner stone, they never have learned to build. When this new revelation comes to them, when they read, in their own tongue, "the wonderful works of God," we may be sure many of them will see the light and rejoice in it.

You remember that devout man who had been to Jerusalem to worship, and was returning, and had, somehow, perhaps at Jerusalem, secured a copy of the sacred Scriptures, and was reading, with the freshness of a devout curiosity, from the book of the prophet Isaiah,—"He was led as a sheep to the slaughter, and like a sheep dumb before his shearer, so he opened not his mouth."

Just then the servant of God, sent by an angel, and moved by the Holy Spirit, came to him and said—

"Understandest thou what thou readest?"

And he said, "How can I, except some one guide me?"

Then Philip preached to him Jesus, and told him that story with which he was so familiar, and rehearsed the scenes which he very probably had himself witnessed only a very few weeks or months before; and when the story was told, how readily the man believed! Just so there is many a man who might take the Old Testament and fail to comprehend it. He needs the living influence of the living teacher to testify the Gospel of the grace of God, and beginning at that same place to preach unto him Jesus, reasoning out of the Scriptures as did the apostle in his ministry, proving that Jesus is the promised Messiah, and so opening the path of light and life to those who have so long sat in darkness and the shadow of death.

Hence it should be our joy to labor with heart and hand, and with earnest faith and fervent love to press forward this work, and thus scatter the leaves of that Book which, like the leaves of the tree of life, are for the healing of the nations, and tell abroad to the man who sit in darkness, and who say, "Who will show us any good?" the words that God hath given to us, the words that teach us the way of peace, the words that are able to make us wise unto salvation, through faith that is in Christ Jesus. And we may be sure that our labor will not be in vain; for, "As the rain which cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater; so shall My Word be that goeth forth out of My mouth: it shall not return unto Me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it. For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace; the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off," Isa. iv. 10-13.—H. L. Hastings, in Quarterly Record of the Trinitarian Bible Society.

Honorable Labor.

There are some people who seem to regard labor as dishonorable and beneath their proper dignity. They are mistaken in this estimate, for God has ordered that man should labor. A Puritan minister, named Carter, coming upon a Christian brother who was busily employed in his work as a tanner, clad in the begrimed and filthy garments appropriate to his calling, gave him with his salutation a friendly slap upon the shoulder. The tanner looked back and said to the minister:

"O, sir, I am ashamed that you should find me employed in this way."

"My friend," said the minister, "may the Savior, when he comes, find me doing just so."

"What," said the tanner, "doing such dirty work?"

"Yes," said the minister, "I mean performing the duties of first

Dirty work sometimes [illegible] Rich money, and no man has a right to be ashamed of faithfully following an honest calling.

Years ago a student from one of the Southern States came to attend the Theological Seminary at Andover. When winter set in he purchased a cord of wood for his stove. But how to prepare it for his fire was the difficulty. He could find no extra hand to chop it for him. There were no circular saws and steam wood-splitting works going then. In his perplexity he went to Professor Stuart to advise him. The learned professor, who knew how to use his hands as well as his head, made short work of the matter.

"Young man," said he, "I am in want of a job myself; and, if you have no objections, I will saw the wood for you, and split it up."

The student concluded that he would not trouble Professor Stuart to saw the wood for him, but preferred to do it himself.

A story is told of a young gentleman who purchased some provisions in a Boston market, and when looking around for some one to carry home his purchase, at last found a quiet man who was willing to do it, and he was so pleased with his conversation and appearance, that thinking he might be glad to employ him again, he asked him his name. After some questioning he found out that the man who had served him so satisfactorily was "Billy Gray," the merchant prince of Boston, the sails of whose ships whitened every sea, and who, perhaps, could have bought out a hundred such men as the one who he had consented to serve.

Are there other examples? Yes. "for the Son of man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." Let him be our pattern and example.—Common People.

Right dreads not the scrutiny of the investigator. Truth can stand the noonday brightness. The Bible can endure the electric flash. The friends of Jesus need not fear when the citadel of their faith is stormed. Christianity is invincible. The severest tests and most hostile criticism only bring into bolder relief its verity, its beauty and its excellence.

The everyday cares and duties, which man call drudgery, are the weights and counter-poises of the clock of time, giving its pendulum a true vibration, and its hands a regular motion.—Longfellow.

We have been sending several papers to residents in foreign lands. Some of these have been going to localities in Southern Asia, and some to places in different parts of Europe. As a general thing these papers are sent to persons who are laboring for the promotion of the truth, especially in relation to the soon coming of Christ and the consequent establishment of the kingdom of God. Friends of the cause have subscribed and paid for these papers in years past. As a general thing some brother or sister has singled out some name of a dear servant of Christ, and prepaid the subscription price of THE RESTITUTION for one year. As we have to prepay special postage, the cost of each such subscription is $2.50 a year. Some of these foreign subscriptions are already provided for by the same individuals who have sent them in past years. Several are not as yet thus attended to. Who would like to send a copy of THE RESTITUTION to two or three in Southern India, or to Southern Europe, or to Jerusalem. There is a chance to send to all these localities. [illegible] are called for, and they [illegible]ENT.

THE following is a copy of the letter to which we alluded two weeks ago. Who of our subscribers would like to subscribe for our brother in Macedonia, by paying for THE RESTITUTION for one year, and having it addressed to him? The price for foreign countries is $2.50 a year. The Editor sends one prepaid to Pastor Byse, Lousanne, Switzerland. A sister in Argos sends it to Masulamini in Hindostan. Some others send to other names in different parts of the Old World. We could send two or three more if some friends choose to meet the expense. We now give the letter.

Elder S. A. Chaplin:

DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST:—Some one has sent me a copy of "Christ's Kingdom," by Joseph Lacier, and also "The Restitution," by E. Miller. I find that you believe firmly in the soon coming of the Christ of God to establish his everlasting kingdom, etc. Praise God! Enclosed you will find my history and experience briefly. If you think best, print it in your excellent paper, THE RESTITUTION. Our need is great for workers. I am the only one at present with a little flock. Pray for us and Macedonia. I am yours in Jesus, the Son of God.

BASIL STEPHANOFF.

P. S. Any book or tract will be much appreciated by us. If you can, also send me THE RESTITUTION. I expect to publish a magazine in the Bulgarian language by and by. We trust God for all. My address is,

PASTOR BASIL STEPHANOFF,
Monastir,
Macedonia,
European Turkey.

☞ Acts xvi. 9, 10.

We give the full and exact copy of the letter, not omitting the Scripture to which he directs attention by the index finger. By a reference to Zell's large Atlas accompanying his Encyclopedia, we find Monastir situated in a division of Macedonia named Roumelia, and that it is a city containing 14,000 inhabitants. Paul preached through these regions though he may not have visited this place. Brethren, let us help Macedonia.

In our issue for Nov. 9, 1887, we printed the account of the life and experience of our brother from the Judgment Message, to which we refer our readers.

SUSPENDED CONSCIOUSNESS, AND DURATION.

Of the essential nature and distinctive qualities of both matter and spirit we are profoundly ignorant. From the same omnipotent creative source both have originated, and through both, separate or combined, the Infinite and Eternal displays his wonder-working perfections. From the revealed fact that "God is Spirit," and from the conceptions that we have formed of celestial beings, as spiritual existences, we have become disposed to greatly depreciate the material. We are forgetful that to man, at least, the power, wisdom, and goodness of God have been manifested only through the material. The world over which the Morning Stars sang their heavenly anthems was a material world, made glorious and beautiful by the creative energies of God himself. And man, too, as a "fearfully and wonderfully made" paragon of perfection, was formed of material elements, before the Creator inbreathed into him the vitalizing, animating breath of life. Of the nature of life, or vitality, in all its higher or lower manifestations, we are also profoundly ignorant. All we know of the "Spirit of life," or, more fully, of "the breath of the Spirit of life," has been in its connection with materially organized forms, and substantial entities. This vitalizing element,—call it life or spirit as we please,—has come from God into all the organized beings belonging to this mundane sphere. Of vitality energizing any organization into activity, or of an inspiriting essence of any kind, as detached from the material form to which it was united by divine power, we have no kind of sensible knowledge. From man in life to reason about man in death, we can only reason from what we know. Conceding that the "Spirit of life" is an essence of some kind,—even of a very exalted kind,—would not demonstrate that it must of necessity, be capable of moral and intellectual manifestations of itself—or could even be conscious—in that state where it is bereft of all that grand organization purposely made for the conscious, intellectual, and moral manifestations of its powers and faculties. Of our conscious personal existence, and of the succession of events connected with that existence, we must draw our illustrations from the lessons taught by our personal experience, while existing as organized beings in our perfect living state, rather than from some hypothesis, however ingeniously framed, concerning the death state. For the human spirit to exercise its functions the bodily organization seems absolutely indispensible, and to pronounce the body a mere clay-clog, or something equally depreciating, looks very much like reflecting on the wisdom of our Creator. Should death be a state of suspended consciousness—as we conclude from Scripture teaching that it is—the personal identity—the selfhood—is in the power of the Omnipotent One for its perfect preservation and restoration to the saved when raised up in Christ's likeness at the last day. On this point we are fully assured that OUR LIFE is hid with Christ in God, and that when he appears we shall also appear with him in glory. It is not our conception that the hidden life of the saints can be, at one and the same time, a most gloriously revealed life in Heaven or Paradise. Without pursuing this thought any farther at this time we give an extract on Duration and Suspended Consciousness from a work of Prof. T. C. Upham, entitled Elements of Mental Philosophy. We quote from Vol. I. pp. 242, 243.

"ORIGIN OF THE NOTION OF DURATION.

There is usually understood to be a distinction between the idea of succession and that of duration, though neither can be defined. The idea of succession is supposed to be antecedent in point of time to that of duration (we speak now of succession and duration relatively to our conception of them, and not in themselves considered).

Duration must be supposed to exist antecedently to succession in the order of nature; but succession is the form in which it is made to apply to us; and is, therefore, naturally the occasion on which the idea of it arises in men's minds. Having the notion of succession, and that of personal or self-existence, a foundation is laid for the additional conception of permanency or duration; in other words, it naturally arises in the mind, or is suggested under these circumstances.

As we cannot, according to this view of its origin, have the notion of duration without succession, hence it happens that we know nothing of duration when we are perfectly asleep, because we are not then conscious of those intellectual changes which are involved in succession. If a person could sleep with a perfect suspension of all the mental operations from this time until the resurrection, the whole of that period would appear to him as nothing. Ten thousand years passed under such circumstances would be less than a few days or even hours.

That the notion of succession (we do not say succession itself, but only our notion or idea of it) is antecedent to, and is essential to that of duration, is in some measure proved by various facts. There are on record a number of cases of remarkable somnolency, in which persons have slept for weeks and even months. One of the most striking is that of Samuel Chilton, a laborer of Tiverton, near Bath, in England. On one occasion, in the year 1670, he slept from the ninth of April to the seventh of August, about seventeen weeks, being kept alive by small quantities of wine poured down his throat. He then awoke, dressed himself, and walked about the room, being perfectly unconscious that he had slept more than one night. Nothing, indeed, could make him believe that he had slept so long, till, upon going to the fields, he saw crops of barley and oats ready for the sickle, which he remembered were only sown when he last visited them.'

The result is similar when the suspension of the mental action is caused in any other way. It is related, for instance, of a British captain at the battle of the Nile, that he was giving an order from the quarter-deck of his vessel, when a shot struck him in the head, depriving him instantaneously of sense and speech. Living, however, he was taken home, and remained in this condition for the period of fifteen months in the Greenwich Hospital. At the end of that period, during which he had exhibited signs of intelligence, an operation was performed on him by a skilful surgeon, that restored him at once to the exercise of his mental faculties. And it is stated, as the first result of this mental restoration, that he immediately rose in his bed, and completed the order which had been so abruptly interrupted so many months before.

In the Proceedings of the French Royal Academy of Sciences in 1718, there is a statement illustrative of the subject under consideration, to the following effect:—There was in Lausanne a nobleman, who, as he was giving orders to a servant, suddenly lost his speech and all his senses. Different remedies were tried, but, for a very considerable time without [illegible] six months, he appeared to be in a deep sleep, unconscious of everything. At the end of that period, however, [illegible] and having been had to certain surgical operations, he was suddenly restored to his speech and the exercise of his understanding. When he recovered, the servant to whom he had been giving orders happened to be in the room, he asked him if he had done what he had ordered him to do, not being sensible that any interval, except a very short one, had elapsed during his illness."

If an unnatural, profound sleep, or a partial disarrangement of the bodily organization, while life is not extinct, suspends consciousness, and involves the loss of all idea of duration, are we to conclude that the awful sleep of death, and the total disarrangement and destruction of all organization, will have no effect on spirit consciousness and the realization of duration? Can the vitalizing spirit exhibit its functions independent of all organization?

ROME—CONSTANTINOPLE.

The events of these last days are prophetically connected with the wasting away and final downfall of these "Abominations of Desolation." As these are fore-doomed to a marked and dreadful overthrow it becomes the student of prophecy and history to carefully note all events transpiring in connection with either or both with carefulness. As smaller matters in the chain of history we note the following items:

ROME, Jan. 5.—The Pope's speech to the pilgrims is regarded as distinctly putting an end to the idea of conciliation with the Italian Government.

BOSTON, Jan. 5.—Intelligence received at the rooms of the American Board here shows that the Turkish Government is revising its school laws, with the evident aim of suppressing American and other foreign schools. The new law provides that no foreigners can open a school without a special firman given by the Sultan himself, and such documents he is very slow to give. The law forbids any Ottoman subject from attending such a school until he shall have taken a course of religious training in one of his own schools, while foreign schools are to abstain entirely from religious instruction. The schools already existing are to be suppressed unless they conform to these regulations within six months. As a large amount of capital is invested in educational institutions in Turkey, our Minister, Mr. Straus, has protested against this law, and he has urged that their embassies to join him in opposing it.

Shepherds in the East.

To see the sheep following the shepherd brought back to one's mind the words of our Lord, especially when I found that the goat or ram which led the flock, and some others that followed the shepherd closely, had a name to which they answered when called by him. John x. 3. As there are no fences, and many flocks, it is necessary that each flock should learn to follow its own shepherd; nor must it wander off to the green patches of wheat or barley, as it would if not thus trained. To go astray in the open plain brings danger, for a lost sheep is a ready prey to some chance wild beast from the mountains. But if it be lost in the desolate hills its destruction is almost certain if it be not found again, for there wolves and jackals abound, while leopards still prowl in the hills of Gilead in those round the Dead Sea, and about Carmel and the hills of Galilee.

On the lonely, unfenced hills and stony mountains, the danger that wild beasts will attack the flock is always sufficient to make a careful guard necessary. The yell of the hyena, and the shriek of the jackal may, even this day, be heard close to Jerusalem, and venomous snakes are common in the hot season. The limestone rocks and chalky hills afford the serpent tribe the very haunts they love, and in summer they become very dangerous. The deadly cobra—perhaps the "asp" of the Bible, the viper in two varieties, and six other poisonous snakes, are more or less common; one of them, the horned snake, only twelve or eighteen inches long, being so deadly that a man bitten by it dies in half an hour. Besides these, the shepherd has to guard against huge birds of prey, which swoop down on a stray kid or lamb, and need all the vigor of the shepherd to beat them off. But none of these fees terrify the brave protector of the flock. If the flock be small, he is generally its owner, or one of the family, for though "hirelings" are necessary when the flocks are large, they cannot always be trusted, John x. 12–15.

There are no lions in Palestine now, and bears are only seen in the upper gorges of Lebanon; but the shepherds of to-day are often as manly and faithful as David long ago, when he went out single-handed, at one time after a lion, and at another after a bear, and delivered the lambs out of their mouths, 1 Sam. xvii. 35.

But wild beasts are not the only danger to a flock. The hills abound in caves and hiding-places which are often the resort of robbers, and the wandering Bedouins, in their black tents, are always ready to steal goats, sheep, or cattle when opportunity offers. Round Kerak, in Moab, the sheep masters give so much a year to the Bedouin sheikhs as a security that these hereditary thieves will not harry the folds—a state of things exactly like that of which David speaks when he reproaches Nabal at Carmel for refusing his followers food and refreshment, 1 Sam. xxv. 7.

Shepherds often, like Jacob, or like the shepherds of Bethlehem, abide in the field or open country, keeping watch over their flocks by night, Luke ii. 8; the parching drought consuming them by day and the frost by night, Gen. xxxi. 40. In the early spring the best pasturage is on the sea-coast plains; but, as the heat increases, the flocks are driven higher and higher, till the hot summer finds them on the tops of the mountains. When no sheepfold is near, a ring of thorny bushes is heaped up, but the wolf, after all, may leap into the guarded circle, though the dogs of the flocks be watching outside. On the lowland plains the ruins of the ancient towns and cities supply stones for permanent folds, the walls of which are often protected by a ring of thorns laid above them. A slight shelter near at hand is frequently all the protection through the night for their guardians; indeed, in the highest ridges of Lebanon, far above human habitation, they often have to content themselves with the shelter of some slight bend in the ground, setting stones around it, and strewing rushes within, for a bed. A fire kindled in the center, so that they can lie with their feet to it, is their only comfort, and their furniture consists of nothing more than a few pots or pans, some sheep skins, and old rugs, under charge of faithful dogs during the day, when the shepherds are perhaps miles away. In the south they often sleep in the open air throughout the year.

With the dawn of day the shepherds wake, and each of them "putteth forth" his own sheep, counting them as he lets them pass slowly out under his rod, through the one doorway. To help him in doing so "he calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out," John x. 3, for flocks of different shepherds may have rested through the night in the same fold. Unlike the thief or robber who stealthily climbs the wall, he goes in through the door to bring out his flock; the shepherd who, for the time, is acting as gate-keeper gladly opening to him as he approaches.

The usual color of the goat in Palestine is black, so that the comparison in Canticles of the locks of the Beloved, hanging in rich abundance over her shoulders, to a flock of long-haired goats, feeding on the slopes of the Gilead hills, one above the other, was as natural to a poet of the country as it is beautiful. The Beloved herself, exposed to the scorching heat, in the vineyards of which her brothers had made her keeper, says, as she thinks of her complexion, burnt black "because the sun hath looked upon her," that she is like the tent of Kedar, "beautiful" in their outline as an encampment, though the tent coverings, woven of goats' hair, were black, like her own sun-tanned features (Song of Sol. i. 5. One especially useful purpose once served by goats' hair, is told us in David's history, when his wife, Michal, took one of the household images, or teraphim, and having duly laid it on a bed under the bed-clothes, put on its head an extemporized wig of goats' hair, no doubt like his own in color, so that the counterfeit passed off as the young hero himself, and saved him from the emissaries of Saul, 1 Sam. xix. 13–16. It must, however, have been the hair of a reddish-brown goat, not of a black one, that Michal used, as David had auburn hair, 1 Sam. xvi. 12; xvii. 42; "ruddy"—red-haired. There is a kind of goat with such brownish-red hair, and there are also goats pied and speckled, like those which Jacob had for his share, though the black ones greatly predominate.—Dr. Cunningham Geikie.

The History of the Jewish Nation.

The history of the Jewish nation cannot be written alone. It entwines with the history of all other nations; rather it is the central axis, around which all other history revolves. Indeed, most of the nations of antiquity are only seen at all by the light which flashes from the cloudy pillar which guided the course of the chosen people of the Lord. To write the history of this nation, we must write the history of all nations and of all lands. We shall find the history of this race touching these ancient memories which otherwise had faded from human recollection. The dwellers in Mesopotamia; the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah; the founders of Nineveh; the long-forgotten government of the Hittites; the Assyrians; the Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and the Roman empires, are all seen most clearly in their connection with this strange and mysterious people. And since the days of their dispersion we find them in every quarter of the globe; in all the kingdoms of Europe; in the depths of Asia; in the heart of Africa; separated from all, hated and despised by all; and yet surviving hate and persecution, exile, and oppression; and still dwelling in the presence of their enemies, an anvil which destroys the hammers which smite it; a burning bush which stands unconsumed amid the flames.

Forty, perhaps fifty, centuries rest upon this venerable contemporary of Egypt, Chaldea, and Troy. The Hebrew defied the Pharaohs; with the sword of Gideon he smote the Midianite, in Japthah, the children of Ammon. The purple chariot-bands of Assyria went back from his gates humbled and diminished; Babylon, indeed, tore him from his ancient seats, and led him into captivity by strange waters, but not long. He saw the Hellenic flower bud, bloom, and wither upon the soil of Greece. He saw the wolf of Rome, suckle upon the banks of the Tiber, and prowl, ravenous for dominion, to the ends of the earth until paralysis and death laid hold upon its savage sinews. In every kingdom of the modern world there has been a Jewish element. There are Hebrew clans in China; on the steppes of ancient Asia; in the desert wastes of Africa. The most powerful race have not been able to assimilate them,—the bitterest persecution so far from extermination them, has not eradicated a single characteristic. In mental and moral traits, in form and feature even, the Jew today is the same as when Jerusalem was the peer of Tyre and Babylon. In the greedy energy of the Jewish trader smoulders something of the old fire of the Maccabees. Abraham and Mordecai stand out upon the sculptures of Nineveh, marked by the same eye and beard, and the same nose and jaw by which we just now recognised their descendants.—The Story of the Jews, pp. 4. 5.

Dear Restitution:

Let me say to the dear brethren and sisters, that I am at home again after an absence of just twenty-eight days. I found all well at home, for which I thank my Heavenly Father. My health is also a little better than it was through the summer, for which I also thank God.

I left home Friday before the second Sunday in November and staid over the first Sunday in December. I went to Ripley, Ill., where Brother Bowman and Brother Laning live. When I landed there I was somewhat discouraged as the Campbellites and also the Methodists had a meeting at the same time, so that did not leave many for me. To begin with, we started with about thirty at the third meeting, but they began to flock in and the result was good. Some six put on Christ by baptism and two or three more expected to on the following Sunday; one backslider reclaimed and made to rejoice. The Campbellites were all excited and now say they do not believe in the inherent immortality of the soul. Several of them have embraced the one faith; some of them have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine, others are just ready to obey.

I left them Thursday evening before the fourth Sunday in November. At parting we sang, "When Jesus comes to reward his servants." Many were the tears that were shed that night, not only by church members but by outsiders. A number of outsiders came to me and asked me when I was coming back again. The answer was, whenever there would be a way opened again. The brethren, although poor in this world's goods, remembered me kindly and remembered that those that would preach the gospel must live of the gospel. Farewell to the brethren and sisters at Ripley.

I started for Morrill, Brown Co., Kan., where the Brethren Saylers live. At that place I held forth over two Sundays. The weather was somewhat unfavorable but we had good meetings and a good interest. Started a Bible reading class at that place and also one at Ripley, Ill. All seemed anxious for a class at both places. What the result will be God only knows. They also remembered my wants. These brethren, both at Ripley and Morrill, believe a whole gospel. They believe the gospel preached to Abraham, "Saying, in thee shall all nations be blessed," Gen. xxii., the oath God has made to Abraham. I also promised them I would return to their place in the spring if my life was spared and the Master had not come before that time comes.

I am also glad that our Brother S. A. Chaplin still holds the Editor's place in THE RESTITUTION office and hope he may continue till the Master comes when we will need THE RESTITUTION no more. I have tried to get new subscribers for the paper, but times are so hard that it is almost impossible to get one to subscribe, but still they will have their tobacco, tea and coffee, and some political paper. I have got a lot of promises for next spring or summer if they can. I bid the dear brethren adieu and started for home.

And now I will say in conclusion that I believe what will be done will have to be done inside of five years. I am of the belief that the bride will be taken inside of that time. Now is the time to come out of Babylon and be a separate people. Rev. xviii. 4. Not go in, take part with her, say amen at her ignorance that she is abiding the purple with. Let us persuade all of God's children to come out. Those of you that have dollars and cents put the money to good use. If you can't preach yourself send some one to preach; do not hoard up your money in banks, do not loan it out to your poor brother at 10, 12, 18, 24, per cent. on the dollar. For the time is not far in the future when you will wish that you was one of those men that James speaks of when he says, "Hearken my beloved brethren, has not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom of God."

Well, dear brethren, I expect to preach while I live if there should be a way opened, or at least as long as I can speak, and after that I will point with my finger up to heaven to the Lamb of God that takes away the sin of the world. Since last June I have baptized some 88 or 40. I have sung no hymn to excite men and women into obedience; only took the good old way of the Savior and the apostles, and the good work is still going on. I am hard up; I got behindhand on the account of bad management, but I will not murmur nor complain, as I learn that those whom the Lord loves he chastens, and he worketh out everything after the counsel of his will.

What I have written I have written in haste, as I have much to do here before I am ready for winter and am not able to do much at a time. So what I write I have to do in a hurry. May we all fare well in the kingdom of God. May we all fare well when Jesus comes to reward His servants. May you and I be of that chosen number, for many are called but few are chosen. May we all meet in the kingdom of God, is my prayer, for Christ's sake, amen.

PAPILLION, Neb.

Dear Restitution:

I have of late much interest Silas Heath's article on the parable of the ten virgins. It has recalled to mind my experience of those exciting times, '43 and '44. I was told those who professed to believe the Lord would come and when 1843 passed by, the time was postponed until 1844 the 10th day of the 7th month; delusion. I was living in Watertown, a few miles from Boston, Mass. In the Fall of 1842 I attended lectures in the evening on Christ and was astonished beyond measure to hear that the kingdom of God was to be set up on this planet, concerning which kingdom our Savior proclaimed glad tidings. How my heart did rejoice in the full conviction of this truth. The time might be all right; I was not so clear. How I read the Bible from childhood and wondered I could not understand it. I sought to commentaries, but they generally made the word darker. But the truth concerning the kingdom was the key that unlocked and opened the treasures of that book. I now did not simply read the book but searched it with an intense desire. Not much progress could be made, however, during the whirlwind excitement of '43 and '44. There were some fifty of us, and as time passed on fanaticism sprung up among us and finally the Watertown band came to be the very hot bed of fanaticism. There were those in our midst who claimed they had no use for the word of God, they were so filled with the spirit. "The letter killeth," said they. I have a Bible given me by one of the sisters. She said she had no use for it. I felt to pity her but she was part holden. I think this fanaticism was due to time resting.

Well, our numbers decreased on account of these things. However, my heart was so captivated by the "glad tidings" I had no idea of leaving. We went along still we reached and passed the climax. Then there came a breaking time. Our band dissolved and melted away. I don't know one among them all that ever progressed beyond the world burning theory. The prophet says that "Israel shall be saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation; ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end." No, says the Second Adventist, they are all going to be burnt up in 1843 and '44, and they still stick to it.

The prophet says, "Thou will cast all their sins into the depths of the sea." I cannot write this without a thrill of joy. Is it a light thing to say the Lord will deny his word? That he will not fulfil it? Then we may call death an eternal sleep. Our future hopes hang entirely on the restoration of Israel. They are being schooled and fitted for a purpose, that they may fulfil their destiny and stand at the head of the nations. "Saved with an everlasting salvation;" then will come in the song, "Hallelujah the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." "He will rest in his love." In love with truth,

JOHN PERKINS.

The Cost of War.

The civil war in the United States carried to the grave over six hundred thousand men, and cost over six million dollars. This vast sum, if carefully divided, would give a handsome homestead to every family in the United States. A house and ground enough to cultivate for all necessary food could be given without inconvenience to every family, north and south, for the money spent in this cruel conflict. The older struggles in Europe besides the bloody sacrifice demanded have impoverished the nations. Over twenty thousand million dollars of public debt now hang like a millstone about the neck of productive industry in consequence of those wasting wars. Over nine hundred million dollars are now paid in annual interest on this sunken treasure. The ordinary taxes would be comparatively light if it were not for the burden left by wars already past and the heavier weights imposed by the constant preparation for possible or expected strife.

MISSIONARY FUND.

Free will donations are solicited for the purpose of sending papers to the poor, and supplying books and papers to mission workers, in this and other lands. We do not want, and will not accept a penny for a "sinking fund," but every cent placed in our hands will go as the donor would have it, to further the cause of the blessed Master.

CHRIST CRUCIFIED.

My God, my God, O why am I
Forsaken and alone?
By sinner's hands I'm tied and bound,
Who mock and scoff my pain.
They wag with cruel looks around,
And think by sorrows vain.

My bleeding hands and feet they pierce—
Behold this body torn—
And save around like flaming fierce
With anathematic scorn.
But O, they know not what they do—
Forgive them, O, forgive—
They know not such I observe who
Expired that they might live.

Let pardon to their souls be given
Through his atoning blood—
They crucified their only friend,
Yet, O forgive, my God.
Thus did the great Redeemer pray
With his expiring breath.
Though he dissolved his soul away,
And gave him to death.

Then did the sun in darkness hide,
The earth was in mourning;
The Prince of Life they crucified,
The Lord they did not Know.

Lord, let my heart in sorrow melt
For sufferings such as these;
And let the pains my Savior felt
My soul from sin release;
For there Christ my sins has died
That I might live in Him;
Let all my sins be crucified,
But mercy show to me.

TEMPERANCE--INTEMPERANCE.

WHAT WHISKY COSTS.

It costs the people of the United States $900,000,000 annually for liquor.

A silver dollar is about an eighth of an inch thick, or about nine to the inch. This would require 100,000,000 inches of space to pile this money in, or in feet 8,333,333. This makes in rods 505,050, and in miles 1578. Just think of it, 1578 miles of silver dollars laid down, packed closely together, is what it costs the people of the United states for liquor. This is ten times more than what it costs to maintain the public schools of that nation annually.

BEER IS AS BAD AS WHISKY.

For some years a decided inclination has been apparent all over the country to give up the use of whisky and other strong alcohols, using as a substitute beer and other compounds. This is evidently founded on the idea that beer is not harmful and contains a large amount of nutriment; also that bitters may have some medical quality which will neutralize the alcohol which it conceals. These theories are without confirmation in the observation of physicians. The use of beer is found to produce a species of degeneration of all the organs; profound and deceptive fatty deposits, diminished circulation, conditions of congestion and perversion of functional activities, local inflammation of both the liver and kidney being constantly present. Intellectually a stupor amounting almost to a paralysis arrests the reason, changing the highest faculties into mere animalism, sensual, selfish, sluggish, varied only with paroxisms of anger that are senseless and brutal. It is our observation that beer drinking in this country produces the very lowest kind of inebriety, closely allied to criminal insanity. The most dangerous class of ruffians in our city are beer drinkers.

A PERPETUAL MENACE.

Rev. Dr. Darby, who was called upon recently to preach the funeral sermon of a woman at Evansville, Ind., who had been murdered by a man crazed with liquor, spoke in very strong and courageous terms of the saloon evil to the crowd who had been drawn to the house by curiosity. Among other things he said: "Go up and down these streets and read the word 'saloon,' 'saloon,' till it is repeated nearly 250 times, and you will arrive at the source whence this stream of evil proceeds that bears destruction everywhere in its course. * * * The saloon is a perpetual menace to society. Here is a home they have helped to ruin, not intentionally, but still it has been done. Whose wife, whose husband, whose child will be the next victim of their debauchery and death in this community? There is not an habitual drunkard, not a drinking man, but a vile character in all the city who may not procure from almost any saloon all the liquor he may desire at midnight, or Sunday, or any other time. This being true, whose home, whose wife, whose child is safe? The blood of this innocent woman, not only appeals to heaven for justice to be visited upon the murderer, but it appeals also for the protection of our homes against the vile stuff that maddened the murderer's brain."

Rome's Fight in New England.

Never since the fires of Smithfield were lighted, has Rome been more desperate than now. The decree of the Provincial Council in Baltimore in regard to parochial schools is bearing fruit. Thousands and tens of thousands of children are being withdrawn from the public schools. Parochial schools are not only being founded for Roman Catholic children, but in Massachusetts the attempt is begun to quarter the parochial schools in the buildings erected for the children of the State. This has been received in Malden, Massachusetts. A solicitor gave his decision that if rooms were unoccupied in the school-houses they might be let for suitable purposes.

The Romish priest withdrew hundreds of children from the public schools, thus leaving emptied the rooms. Then the priest offered to hire the vacated rooms, and did so at twenty dollars per month, and the fight has begun. It seems terrible. The secular press in Boston has stood beside this great bulwark of liberty. Rome brags even. In towns all round about, the priests have said, We regret it, but we cannot resist the decree. McGlynn lost his place because he would not build a parochial school, we do not wish to incur the ban. On the other hand the people begin to resist. Hundreds of Roman Catholics are saying, if this is done, we leave the church.

Will it be done? It will. Rome is determined to break up our school system. What is the religious press doing about it? Nothing. There is lethargy or a cowardice among Christian people that reminds one of the conduct of the Huguenots. In Lawrence, where one of the most beautiful and one of the largest Roman Catholic houses of worship in the State stands as a monument of the robbery of the poor shop and factory girls, I preached on Sabbath evening, Oct. 2nd, on "The Huguenots, their folly and their fall." There was great fear. The First Baptist meeting-house is in close proximity to this monument of robbery. Is it not strange that Romanists will tolerate such rascality? The Augustinian fathers established a savings bank, received all the money, promising to pay interest on deposits, took all they could get, as did Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, and when they had enough, put it into that great stone pile, covering its walls with the rarest of pictures, and when finished and they were ready, shut down the gates, and sent the poor people adrift. Some fought. A few went to law and recovered their loss, but the mass bore it and are today like sheep, dumb before their shearers, going on as before.

In Pittsburgh, Pa., the same fight is on and one of the most popular priests, the heir to an immense fortune, has, after the seventy-seventh ballot, been elected head of one of the public schools. This is the Priest's uncovered hand. It means education by the religious. The Protestants say they are going to withdraw from this school. Don't do it! Use your votes at the primaries and at the ballot box and abide the result.

The devil is long-headed, and so Rome is full of cunning. When the people gave them Woman Suffrage for the purpose of electing a school board, they surrendered the large cities to priestly control unless our Christian women will take a hand in the fight. For eight weeks I have been in Boston, and have spoken to immense audiences each Sabbath afternoon in Tremont Temple and Music Hall on the various phases of Romanism. Never did I see braver men and women. They are ready to stand up and be counted. The fight is on. It will go to the ballot box, and to the legislature, and in the end Romanism will be beaten, because God and his people are true.—Justin D. Fulton, D. D.

The Form of a Sermon.

There is story of a missionary—a Moravian—who was sent out to the West Indian Islands to preach the gospel to the slaves; but he found that they were driven so hard, that they went forth so early, and came back so late, and so spent, that they could not hear. At night they came from their toil to gnaw their crust, and roll in on their straw, and snore, through their brief hours of repose; and the bell and the whip brought them out again by light in the morning, to go to the field; and he saw that he could not reach them. He was a white man, and they were black. It was the white man that oppressed them. There was nobody to preach to them unless he could accompany them in their labor. So he went and sold himself to their master, who put him in the gang with them. For the privilege of going out with the slaves, and making them feel that he loved them and would benefit them, he worked with them, and suffered with them; and while they worked, he taught; and as they came back he taught; and he won their ear; and the grace of God sprang up in many of these darkened hearts. He bowed himself to their condition, and took upon him their bondage, in order that he might show his sympathy and love for them.

Tell me, is not that the very epitome of what Christ did, who, in order that he might reach the poor and needy, and bring the power of the truth to bear on their understandings, and mitigate their sufferings, and rescue them, and empower their moral nature against their animal nature, "took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross?" He loved me, and gave himself for me."

Prayer.

It has commonly been taught that prayer has four requisites—adoration, confession, thanksgiving and petition. But there is a fifth part in all true prayer, and it is, total surrender to God. I maintain that all true prayer must contain that, and that he who prays to God truly will have experimental evidence of the efficacy of prayer. Whoever will yield himself truly to God, to the best light that he has, will have more light, and must, if he yields to that added illumination, go forward in the path that leads to perfect day. You young men may think that prayer is only sentimentality, but this is because you have never tried it.

Put God to the test. God does not give instincts to mislead, neither to the bird who trusts to the instinct which leads him to fly, nor to the man who trusts to the instinct which impels him to prayer. Prayer is natural, and can not mislead. But it is the efficacy of secret prayer that I desire to lay most emphasis upon. What it does for good is incalculable. After many years, or after only a few hours, of religious awakening, in some great movement, the spirit perceives the hollowness of everything in mere time, and out of some great humiliation, out of the shadow of death, it may be, the soul utters once for all its "Utterly and forever thine." The instant that is said, the world is new. Prayer in all its parts has been offered to God. There is a strange feeling that something from the infinite above has flashed down to the soul and filled it with new light. A well of eternal joy is at once suddenly sprung up in the heart. Its transfigured treasures of soul are no longer in time, but in eternity. The act by which the mind brought itself into communion with the Divine Mind is ratified by the Holy Spirit. I teach no doctrine of perfection, but I maintain that he who throws himself utterly into God's arms will never be allowed to drop from them.—Joseph Cook.

Edison's New Phonograph.

It is now reported that Mr. Edison has perfected his phonograph, or talking machine, so that it will take very delicate sounds and reproduce them almost in equal volume. He has also made an arrangement whereby the tablets containing the sound impressions can be taken from the machine and sent by mail or otherwise to any part of the country, and be reproduced. The difficulty with the first phonographs was that they were not sensitive enough to record anything but very loud sounds, and those spoken close to the instrument. If Mr. Edison has remedied these defects and perfected the machine that will take and register ordinary conversation anywhere within a radius of ten or twelve feet, he has made an invention that will revolutionize our system of phonography, etc. Only think of the possibilities of a machine that you have only to set on a table in a committee room or on a pulpit or platform, in order to obtain a perfectly accurate report of every word that is spoken near it, in the very volume and accents in which it is spoken! Think of receiving a phonographic sheet sent you by a friend in some distant part of the world, which you might place in your own machine and by turning a wheel have your friend conversing with you "as natural as life!" In the same way you might, by preserving the sound tablets, hear the voices of friends and loved ones speaking to you again in the old familiar way, long years after they had departed from the earth. Such results as these are not vain imaginings, but are even now within the range of actual realization.—Christian at Work.

SUNSHINE AND SHOWER.

Two children stood at their father's gate,
Two girls with golden hair,
And their eyes were bright and their faces glad
Because the morn was fair—
For they said, "We will take that long, long walk
To the Hawthorne copse today,
And gather great bunches of lovely flowers
From off the scented May:
And oh! we shall be so happy there,
'Twill be sorrow to come away."

As the children spoke a little cloud
Passed slowly across the sky,
As I one looked up in her sister's face
With a tear-drop in her eye.
For the elder one said, "Oh, heed it not,
'Tis far too fair to rain,
That little cloud may chase the sky
For other clouds in vain."
And so the children's voices rose
In merriment again.

But ere the morning hours waned
The sky had changed its hue,
And that one cloud had chased away
The whole great heaven of blue;
The rain came down in heavy drops,
The wind began to blow,
And the children in their nice warm room
Went fretting to and fro;
For they said, "When we have ought in store
It always happens so."

Now these two fair-haired sisters
Had a brother out at sea,
A little midshipman aboard
The gallant Victory;
And on the self-same morning when
They stood beside the gate,
His ship was wrecked, and oh a raft
He stood all desolate,
With the other sailors round him,
Prepared to meet their fate.

Beyond them shone the cool green land,
The land with its waving trees,
And its little brooks that rise and fall
Like buttertiles on the breeze;
But above them the burning noontide sun
With scorching stillness shone,
Their throats were parched with bitter thirst,
And they knelt down one by one,
And prayed to God for a drop of rain
And a gale to waft them on.

And so the little cloud was sent,
That shower in mercy given,
And as a bird before the breeze
Their barque was landward driven.
And some few mornings after,
When the children met once more,
And their brother told the story,
They knew it was the hour
When they had wished for sunshine,
And God had sent the shower.

"DID YOU SAY G'AWAY?"

A little four-year-old boy whose parents were not in the habit of invoking the blessing of God at table had occasion to spend a few days at his grandmother's, where he soon learned to appreciate the blessed privilege of hearing grace said before partaking of food. But one day his grandmother happened to be absent, and he as usual took his seat at the table with the rest of the family and reverently bowed his little head; but observing the rest begin to eat, he raised his head and quietly asked, "Did you say g'awa?"

THE FOXES HAVE HOLES.

A little boy between four and five years old was one day reading to his mother in the New Testament; and when he came to these words, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head," his eyes filled with tears, his tender breast heaved, and at last he sobbed aloud. His mother inquired what was the matter, but for some time he could not answer. At length, as well as his sobs would let him, he said: "I am sure, mamma, if I had been there I would have given him my pillow."

CIGARETTES QUICKLY KILLED HIM.

A son of one of the professors of Columbian University in Washington died suddenly last week after short detention in his room. So sudden was the attack that a party of young men who had been invited by the deceased to call upon him to play whist kept their engagement only to find their friend a corpse. It was learned that the deceased, who was employed in the Patent Office, had been in the habit of indulging in cigarettes excessively and inhaling the smoke. Two physicians held a consultation, and, after investigation, decided that this practice had exercised a depressing effect upon the action of the heart and had hastened his death. Aortic regurgitation was given as a primary cause of death, which had been increased by the indulgence of the deceased in the inhalement of cigarette-smoke. Everything possible was done by the physicians for their patient, but his constitution had been too surely undermined, and in his last days he was unable to rest quietly in bed, but maintained a sitting position.

A LIGHT FOR OUR FEET.

May lived in a big city where the streets were bright with light every night. Once she went to visit her grandpa in the country. May saw many things she had never seen before. She had fine rides in grandpa's carriage, and walked by the side of the brook and saw the fish playing in the water. One evening grandpa and May went to church. Grandpa got down his lantern to take it along. May wondered what the lantern was for. When they started to go home from church grandpa lighted the lantern. When they walked along the way the light in the lantern showed them where to walk. May was much pleased for she had never walked by the light of a lantern before. Then grandpa said, "The Lord's Word is like this lantern." Then he told May what the Psalmist meant when he said, "Thy Word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path."

It is a dark world through which we are passing: there are dangers all about us, and to get through it safely we need a light to guide us. We may all have this same lamp the Psalmist talks about as a guide for our feet and a light for our path. We will find it in the Bible. Let us all try to walk by its light.

MY SAVIOR.

The sun's rays stole through the windows of the school-house, gently lighting on many a fair face. It was Sunday, and the children were listening again to the old story of the Savior's love. With tears in eye and voice, a lady was picturing something of what our dear Lord suffered and bore for us.

The lesson had been brought to a close, school was dismissed, teacher and taught passed forth into the scented June air, when the lady caught sight of one little loiterer, all alone and silently weeping.

"Jessie, what is the matter?" she asked.

"Oh, ma'am, I never felt before what my Savior went through for me! Oh, what can I do for him?"

There was a moment's silence. The lady knew the wayward heart to which she spoke.

"Jessie, darling," she said, "you can try to be the very best girl in all the class and school for his sake."

That week the lady was called for some months to a distant country. On her return she was speaking with the school-mistress when the latter, knowing nothing of that Sunday afternoon's talk with the child, said suddenly: "I can't think what has come over Jessie Brown. She used to be so troublesome; now she is the best child in all the school."

Little reader, this is true. Resting on and trusting in Jesus' love did, indeed, work this great change in Jessie's life. Has it done the same in yours? Have you ever said, like her, "What can I do for my Savior who did so much for me?" Ah, perhaps not; perhaps the reason is you do not yet know or love him, though he loves you and is calling you to himself. Will you obey his call? "Hear, and your soul shall live!"

BURIAL PLACE OF WILLIAM PENN.

The church and chapel of Chenies, the burial-place of so many generations of Russells, is occasionally the object of a pilgrimage by those who happen to take a pleasure in the delightful scenery of the Valley of Chess, or who wish to see a place of no little historical interest. It is not unworthy of note that so many miles from Chenies, in the middle of what are sometimes called the Buckinghamshire Uplands, is another burial-place, certainly not less interesting than Chenies and scarcely less pleasing to the lover of sylvan scenery. This is the burial-ground of the Society of Friends at Jordans, as it is called—a place about three miles to the east of Beaconsfield. Were it merely the burial-ground of a few undistinguished members of this sect, it might well have received little notice; but as the last resting-place of William Penn and Isaac Pennington, it forms a kind of Mecca for the Quakers of the present time, and a place full of interest to any one who cares at all for the history or religious movement of this country. There is over the grave of William Penn a small upright stone with the name and date of his death. His first and second wives, Gulielma and Hannah, lie by his side; and not far off is the grave of Isaac Pennington, whose fame has been overshadowed by the international celebrity of his son-in-law, but who stands out as remarkably as any of the first adherents of George Fox. It seems somewhat doubtful if these are the original gravestones; the figures appear to be of too modern a character and the inclosure too clear to have withstood the effects of more than a century and a half of rain and decay. That, however, is a small matter; no one will go to Jordans to look for artistic monuments, as they may do to Chenies. If they go, it will be to see the burial-place of a man as remarkable as any in the history of England and of America, and for the purpose of recalling more vividly than is otherwise possible the first days of the Quaker movement in a time when it attracted the notice of the whole English people. While on most days nothing can exceed the rural peace of the place whatever be the time of year—in spring, when the hedgerows about are full of primroses, and the woods and coppices, which abound in all these Bucks bottoms are blue with wild hyacinths; or in the autumn (the season of all others to wander about this country), when the beechwoods glow with color and the cherry orchards seem to be masses of crimson trees—on the first Thursday in June a gathering of Friends from all parts is held, and due honor is done to the great Quaker.—St. James's Gazette.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 18.

CHRISTIAN GRACES.

Graces defined: The favorable influence of God, or divine influence or the influence of the spirit in renewing the heart and restraining from sin.

Lesson Chapter, 2 Peter 1.

Golden Text: Rom. 5, 10.

Leading Thought: A state of reconciliation to God.

Question. What is said of those of the faith who have obtained like precious promises?

Answer. Fourth verse of lesson chapter.

Q. What are we taught to add first to our faith as a Christian grace?

A. Virtue.

Q. What is virtue as used in the lesson?

A. Moral goodness; the practice of moral duties and the abstaining from vice, or, a conformity of life and conversation to the moral law.

Q. What is the second grace mentioned in our lesson?

A. Knowledge.

Q. What is knowledge?

A. It is a clear and certain perception of that which exists, of truth and fact, and it therefore follows that we must know of a certainty the facts in relation to God's plan of salvation, and not rest our hopes upon men's theories.

Q. What is said of the third Christian grace, temperance?

A. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. 1 Cor. 9, 25.

Q. What is said in the Bible in relation to wine or the subject of temperance?

A. Wine is a mocker and strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. Prov. 20, 7; also Prov. 21, 17, and Eph. 5, 18.

Q. What is said of the next grace, patience?

A. In your patience possess ye your souls; Luke 21, 19, and that we through patience might have hope, Rom. 15, 4; and be ye not slothful but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. Heb. 5, 12.

Q. What is meant by adding godliness?

A. A careful observation of the laws of God and performance of religious duties, proceeding from a love and reverence of the divine character and commands, for "Godliness is profitable unto all things." See Tim. And add to all these brotherly kindness, that is, live and think and act to all God's creatures with that kindness that would naturally exist between two affectionate brothers.

Q. What is said of the remaining grace in our lesson, namely charity?

A. Charity edifieth, 1 Cor. 8, 1. If I have not charity I am nothing, 1 Cor. 13, 1. Charity shall cover the multitude of sins. 1 Pet. 4, 8; and many other passages.

"Now if these things be in you and abound they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ; but he that lacketh these is blind and cannot see afar off and has forgotten that he was purged from his old sins; wherefore the rather brethren give diligence to make your calling and election sure. For if ye do these things ye shall never fall, for so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, amen." 2 Peter 1, 8–11.

DIED.

McCHESNEY.—At the home of her father in Marshall Co., Ind., Jan. 2, 1888, Jessie McChesney, aged 27 years, 1 months and 5 days.

Our sister was born August 28, 1861. She was baptized in Feb., 1871, by Elder H. S. Barnhill, since which time she led a consistent Christian life, and died in the enjoyment of the blessed hope of the resurrection to eternal life when Christ, the Life Giver, shall appear. She attended our Conference held in November, at Plymouth, Ind., and communicated the sufferings and death of our dear Redeemer with the brethren and sisters of the Church of God for the last time. Her funeral was attended at the Church of the United Brethren, and a discourse was delivered to a large audience by the Editor of THE RESTITUTION, Tuesday, Jan. 3. So quickly came our first call to a funeral in 1888.

MARRIED.

TANNER—CLEAVELAND.—At the residence of the bride's father, Plymouth, Ind., by Eld. S. A. Chaplin, Thursday, Jan. 5, 1888, Mr. Zachariah M. Tanner, and Miss Carrie M. Cleaveland, both of Plymouth, Marshall Co., Indiana.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL NAMES.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jny" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "8" and reads "Jny8" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1888. "Feb" February, "Mar" March "Apl" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

Read our book list—The Emphatic Diaglott reduced from $4.00 to $2.50, Cruden's Complete Concordance to the Bible, for $1.50, Smith's Bible Dictionary only $1.50. ## A GERMAN PEASANT HYMN.

The beloved Dr. James Hamilton, of London, just before the close of his work, made a fine translation of a German "Peasant Hymn," with which American readers are not generally familiar. It was so exquisitely fresh and beautiful that it was sung at Dr. Hamilton's own funeral.

Neighbor, accept our parting song,
The road is short, the rest is long:
The Lord brought here, the Lord takes hence.
This is no place of permanence.

The bread, by turns of mirth or tears,
Was thine these checkered pilgrim years:
Now, landlord world, shut to the door.
Thy guest is gone forevermore.

Home to a realm of sweet repose,
Our convoy follows as he goes:
Of toil and moil the day was full.
A good sleep now, the night is cool.

Yet village bells ring, softly ring,
And in the blessed Sabbath bring,
What from the weary, work-day tryst
Awaits God's folk through Jesus Christ.

And open wide, thou gate of peace,
And let this other journey cease:
Nor grudge a narrow couch, dear neighbors,
For slumbers won by life-long labors.

Beneath these seals how close ye lie:
But many a mansion's in yon sky:
E'en now beneath the sapphire throne,
Is his, prepared through God's dear Son.

"I quickly come!" that Savior cries;
"Yea, quickly come!" this churchyard sighs;
Come, Jesus, come! we wait for thee—
Thine, now and ever, let us be.

THE SEVENTH-DAY. No. 14. Conclusion.

[Copyrighted, 1887.]

THE PHILOSOPHY OF MRS. WHITE'S VISIONS.

I believe the proof is abundant that Mrs. White's visions are merely the result of nervous disease—a complication of hysteria, catalepsy and ecstasy. That she honestly believes in them herself, I do not doubt. I have personally known four other women, all Seventh-day Adventists, who likewise had visions. All were excellent, sincere Christians, and fully believed in their own visions. But all were sickly, nervous females, and hysterical. Not being encouraged in them, but opposed by their ministers, they finally gave them up. In every age such cases have been numerous, of whom a few, like Mrs. Southcott, Mrs. Ann Lee and Mrs. White, have become noted for awhile.

Medical books and cyclopedias under the words, "hysteria," "catalepsy," and "ecstacy," give a complete description of Mrs. White's case as stated by herself and husband. This any one may see by one day's study. My space will allow me to give but a few points.

1. The sex, a female. "The vast preponderance of hysteria in the female sex has given rise to its name." ("Reynold's System of Medicine," article, "Hysteria.") So say all the authorities. See Dr. Kellogg's "Handbook." Thus fits Mrs. White.

2. The age. "Hysteria is infinitely more common among females, beginning usually from fifteen to eighteen or twenty years of age." ("Theory and Practice of Medicine," by Roberts, p. 399.) "In the female sex, hysteria usually commences at or about the age of puberty; i. e., between twelve and eighteen years of age." ("Reynold's system of Medicine," article "Hysteria.") Here again it exactly fits the case of Mrs. White. She had her first vision at the age of seventeen. (See "Testimonies," Vol. I. p. 82.) At first she had visions almost daily, but they have grown less frequent as she grew older and healthier, till after about forty-five years of age since which time she has not averaged one in five years, and even these are short and light, till now she has ceased entirely to have them. Now read this: "Hysteria generally attacks women from the age of puberty to the decline of the peculiar functions of her sex." (Johnson's Cyclopedia, article, "Hysteria.") Mrs. White's case again, exactly.

3. The cause—hysteria, catalepsy, epilepsy and ecstacy, are all nervous diseases which sometimes co-exist or alternate or blend together so it is difficult to distinguish them. The causes noted are: "(1) mental disturbance, especially emotional; for example, a sudden fright, prolonged grief or anxiety; (2) physical influences affecting the brain, as a blow or fall on the head." ("Theory and Practice of Medicine," Roberts, p. 393.) "In ten of my cases the disease was due to reflex causes, which consisted in six cases of injuries to the head." ("Fundamental Nervous disease," Putzel, p. 66.) This is Mrs. White again, exactly. At the age of nine she received a terrible blow on the face, which broke her nose and nearly killed her. She was unconscious for three weeks. (See her life in "Testimony," Vol. I. pp. 9, 10.) This shock to her nervous system was the real cause of all the visions she afterwards had.

4. Always weakly and sickly. "Most hysterical persons are out of health." ("Theory and Practice of Medicine," Roberts, p. 404.) "Fainting fits, palpitation of the heart appear very frequently, and are sometimes so severe that persons affected with them seem to be dying." ("Encyclopedia Americana," article, "Hysteria.") Now read the life of Mrs. White, and she tells it over and over, times without number, about fainting frequently, pain at the heart, and about being so sick that she expected to die. And it is remarkable that most of her visions were immediately preceded by one of these fainting death-spells. This shows plainly that they are the result of nervous weakness. Her first vision is a fair sample. "My health failed rapidly, I could only talk in a whisper, or broken tone of voice. One physician said....he thought I could not live long: might die very suddenly....I would often awake with my mouth full of blood. My first vision"—and then follows an account of it. ("Spiritual Gifts," Vol. II. p. 30.) There was the cause of her vision—sickness. It was really a hysterical or cataleptic fit, and that is all. On page 48, same book, she falls from the wagon and has a vision. Pages 51, 52, she is insane two weeks, and has a vision. Page 62—sick again, and another vision. Page 83—"Ill and fainted; wrapt in vision." Page 84—"I often fainted like one dead." Page 98—fainted, dying, vision. Same order again. Page 148—"I fainted;....taken off in vision." Who can fail to see the cause of all these visions? On page after page the same story is repeated by herself. In the account of her last vision, Jan. 3, 1875, she is very sick till it ended in a vision. ("Testimonies," Vol. III. p. 570.) Dreadful sick, almost dead, then a vision—this is the story, times without number, from her own pen. That tells the story: the vision is the result of her physical weakness.

5. Visions in public. "As a rule a fit of hysteria occurs when other persons are present, and never comes on during sleep." ("Theory and Practice of Medicine," by Roberts, p. 401.) Most of her visions occur in public, and generally while she is very sick or when praying or speaking earnestly. This was the case with her first vision. ("Spiritual Gifts," Vol. II. p. 30.) So, again, on pages 37, 48, 51, 62, 83, and many more, she has her visions in the presence of many. I do not know that she ever had a vision while alone, or, if so, only once or twice.

6. Does not breathe. "Stoppage of respiration usually complete." "Generally appears to hold his breath." ("Roberts' Theory and Practice of Medicine," pp. 393, 394.) Elder White, describing her condition in vision, says, "She does not breathe." (Life Incidents," p. 272.)

7. Has visions of heaven, etc. "Upon recovering from the spell the patient generally remembers his thoughts and feelings more or less accurately, and sometimes tells of wonderful visions that he has seen, of visits to the regions of the blessed," etc. Mrs. White exactly.

8. Importance of self. "There is a prevailing belief in the importance of self, and the patient thinks that she differs from every other human being." ("Raynold's System of Medicine," article "Hysteria.") Mrs. White to a hair. Hear her herself: "It is God, and not an erring mortal who has spoken." "God has laid upon my husband and myself a special work.' "God has appointed us to a more trying work than he has others." ("Testimonies," Vol. III. pp. 257, 268, 280.)

I regret that space will not allow me to fill out every particular of her experience by quotations from medical works compared with her own statements; but even these are sufficient to show the nature and philosophy of her attacks. They are the result of nervous disease, precisely the same as has been often seen in the case of thousands of other sickly females.

ON THE STUDY OF UNFULFILLED PROPHECY.

All true interest in the subject begins with realizing our relationship to God as his children. Thus we read, Rom. xv. 13, of being "filled with all joy and peace in believing unto the end of our 'abounding in hope,'" i. e., apprehending the blessed future as revealed, and to be yet revealed by our Heavenly Father. For to care for such revelation belongs only to him who is consciously reconciled to God. First, from "the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ," he drinks into his soul joy and peace—even as the eye drinks in light. Then, delivered from self, i. e., finding his true self in God, he thirsts after increased appreciation of that God, from further acquaintance with his thoughts and ways, which constitutes the ailment of hope. Accordingly, God is emphatically entitled THE GOD OF HOPE, the exercise of hope—like love—being to "abide" for ever, because God, the object of it, is the INFINITE ONE from whom will be ever shining forth fresh displays of his glorious perfections; and because the aspirations of man, made after the divine image, and endowed with a capacity for knowing God, require an ever-expanding horizon to satisfy them. How significant the following confession in the autobiography of the late John Stuart Mill, wherein, owing to a mood of seriousness, which he likens to that of "converts to Methodism when smitten by their first conviction of sin," he records: "It occurred to me to put the question directly to myself—Suppose that all your objects in life were realized; that all the changes in institutions and opinions which you were looking forward to could be completely effected in this very instant, would this be a very great joy and happiness to you? And an irrepressible self-consciousness distinctly answered 'No.' At this my heart sank within me; the whole foundation on which my life was constructed fell down. All my happiness was to have been found in the continued pursuit of this end. The end had ceased to charm; and how could there ever again be any interest in the means? I seemed to have nothing left to live for." Such is the verdict of the poor orphaned spirit of man, lacking the knowledge of God, the Fountain and End of his being. And so the question has virtually come to be propounded by the agnostics of our day: "Is life worth living?" But how blessed to contemplate that he, whom, alas! they perversely ignore, while insatiably crying in their confusion of tongues, "Who will show us any good?" has graciously revealed himself in the person and work of his only begotten Son—"the beginning of the creation of God," Rev. iii. 14. Thus, whatever evolution there is discoverable in the order of the universe, from the lowest to the highest organization of existence, is DEVOLUTION from him, who is elsewhere to the same effect entitled, "THE FIRST BORN OF EVERY CREATURE;" "for," adds the inspired writer, "in him" (the correct translation) "were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him, and for him, and he is before all things, and by him all things consist." Col. i. 16, 17. Whereupon, be it remembered, when this GLORIOUS CHRIST OF GOD comes into the world, one of his oracular utterances, for all who have eyes to hear, is as follows: "All things are delivered unto me of my Father; and no man" (no one) "knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man" (any one) "the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." And then from this depository of the divine fulness—this opened bosom, as it were, of the Father—flows the touching invitation for all time: "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light." Matt xi. 28–30.

Thus, to participation in his own blessedness in communion with the Father, ever appreciating and doing the Father's will—the yoke he loved to wear with its fruits of "meekness and lowliness"—does the incarnate Son of God tenderly draw the children of men AS TO THEIR TRUE CENTER. Oh that our laborious scientists, with whom, like Mr. Mill, "increase of knowledge is increase of sorrow," would indeed learn of this blessed one so as to find rest unto their souls, and hereby introduction to the unfathomable depths of divine wisdom and love, in which to expatiate for ever throughout the ages to come! And may not this aspiration be addressed as an admonition to our British Association for the Promotion of Science, which lately at its annual meeting (through its President) sounded forth as its keynote of progress the sad sentiment of Lessing: "If God should hold in his right hand all truth, and in his left hand the ever active desire to seek truth, though with the condition of perpetual error, I would humbly ask for the contents of the left hand, saying, 'Father, give me this; pure truth is only for thee.'"

For what, be it asked, is "ALL TRUTH" but another term for GOD HIMSELF? And in preferring to the knowledge of him the exercise of continuous inquisitiveness after creation outside of him, must not man's enjoyment come to an end in the exhaustion of that creation, the same being finite, and in thus having nothing left to live for—the sad contemplation of Mill? Alas! for the deluded. The truth being that, in the eternal life of the believer—though love will be ever in the ascendant, the greatest grace—yet faith and hope will also abide, taking in as the ailment of that love the knowledge of God—THE INFINITE ONE—with his ceaseless flowings forth in blessing. Alas! how few think of this "abiding" character of faith and hope, even as they neglect the word of prophecy which ministers to these graces.—James Kelly, in Rainbow.

Wide Awake 1888.

The readers of this wonderful magazine for young people are so accustomed to good reading and pictures that they will wonder how it is going to be better than ever this coming year. But it is.

The new year has already begun with the holiday number just out—a truly great number, larger and richer, more varied, and therefore it must be better than ever before. And the publishers have a primer to send to those who want to know what the Wide Awake is going to have in it in 1888.

The wonder is that such a library and picture-gallery can be got together for $2 40 a year—a thousand pages and everything fresh and new—stories, history, travels, biography, sketches, anecdote, adventure—and all instructive as well as entertaining. Two worlds are drawn from to make such provision for the education and pleasure of our children.

Such writers and subjects as these: Edmund Clarence Steadman, The Star Bearer, a lofty Christmas poem. Andrew Lang, Ballad of a Bad Boy, bit of autobiography. H. Rider Haggard, A Tale of Three Lions, a book in itself. Sidney Luska, My Uncle Florimond, a serial. M. E. W. Sherwood, Those Cousin's of Mabel's and Double Rose, two serials. Jessie Benton Fremont, a serial, Cruise of a Coverlet. Harriet Taylor Upton, serial historical papers, Children of the White House. Elbridge S. Brooks, opportunity papers, Getting On in the World. Louise Imogen Guiney, The Bringing-Up of Puppies, not all in a month by any means. Oscar Fay Adams, Dear Old Story-Tellers. Mary Bradford Crowninshield, a serial, Plucky Small: His Story. Edward Everett Hale, historical serial, The Story of Boston Common.

And these are not half, not a quarter, of those in sight.

So high is the best of young people's literature nowadays that we are all of us glad to be young. Nine tenths of reading people prefer it to what is written for them; for it has the rare merit of being easy as well as good.

We know of no Christmas gift so sure of bringing a happy response in a reading family. Send $2 40 to D. Lothrop Company, Boston.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity.
By J. F. Weathes.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar items, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Unseen Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Eastern Question.
In its various phases,—Egyptian, British, Russian, Ottoman, Reform, American and Mussulman, by J. F. Weathes. The title of this book gives a good idea of its contents, and the reputation of the author is a guarantee of its worth. The subject as a whole, and in its different divisions is handled in a masterly manner, and the reader is convinced at once that the author has spared no labor in the study of his topics. The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 640 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $3.00. Send to this office; orders will now be promptly filled, as we have received an invoice of the book, and will send direct from here. The two books, "Coming Age" and "Eastern Question" if ordered together, $4.00.

Smith, is just the "aid" to Bible study that you need, and every thorough student should place a copy on his table—you cannot read a chapter in your Bible without coming to some question on which you wish more information, and the best help you can get is Smith's Standard Bible Dictionary. ### "HONOR TO WHOM HONOR IS DUE."

Time is ever on the wing, and we it is that are passing away! The place and those with whom we associate will soon know us no more; even those near and dear to us will forget much of us; and one or two generations hence, will ask who or what we were, how we looked, and how we acted! In our sphere we all seem to fill our niche; it may be we do not fill pose in that niche as some think we should, and criticism as to matter as well as manner will be freely dispensed, for oh, we do like to give our opinion! and sometimes it is given regardless of cost!

"He that is first in his own cause seemeth just; but his neighbor cometh and searcheth him." This is as true today as when the proverb was written. "Self-praise is no recommendation," this is equally true! The purport, and only intent of this article is, to present a few extracts, and a few comments possibly, on the course of one "Though dead yet speaketh," and to whom I have thought an insufficient amount of credit has been given for bold utterances made when the voice of the people, specially those occupying the pulpits and platforms were loud in denunciation of seeming innovations on "established" doctrines.

June, 1854, thirty-three years ago, a very memorable convention was called to "Freely and fully canvass the origin, authority, and influence of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures." The call was made by about one hundred and seventy-five persons, among whom were Revs., Profs., "strong-minded women," avowed infidels, spiritualists, and Freethinkers of all stripes, not forgetting that wonderful class called philosophers! In the call were these lines:

"He who has a truth and keeps it,
Keeps what not to him belongs.
But performs a selfish action,
And his fellow-mortal wronges."

Such persons as Andrew Jackson Davis, William Lloyd Garrison, Joseph Barker, Henry C. Wright, and others, were expected to take active parts in the discussion. The first resolution was spoken to by Andrew J. Davis. Resolved, that each mind, by virtue of its endowments, rights and liberties, should "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good." Strange as it may appear, the Bible being on trial, that its very language should be used in quotation, as a basis of discussion! I have no intention whatever of introducing all the speakers, whose speeches cover 320 pages of a 12mo. volume, but simply do as I have already said.

The glittering generalities which Mr. Davis used, and his reflection on the "priestly and dogmatic pulpits," as contrasted with "the freeman's pulpit," were indeed presented as A. J. D. was wont else to do. Having seen and heard the man, who could, and did say in my hearing, that "the identical notes of music could be seen as they came forth from an instrument of music, and that the perfume of flowers could also be seen, and that he, when in the 'raft condition had seen all this, and more too! Such a person, known as the Poksepsie Seer, was the opening mouthpiece for this convention, and from him we certainly should expect such language as "Brethren, let us free ourselves from the sectarianism of the churches, from the mythology of the Bible, from the slavery of fear, from the chains of superstition!"

Those who then argued for the hanging, drawing and quartering of the Bible, and consigning it to oblivion, as a tissue of falsehoods, only said what had been said before by Paine, Hume, Bollingbroke and Voltaire; and they have kept up what they have said in the face of superabundant evidence, and that of the cumulative character to the contrary!

'Tis a very pleasing pastime with many, to live to die; and that ends all! And whether it is foreseen the Magnificent, living in, and surrounded with the pomp and pride, the Art and fawning of his courtiers; or he who has lived in drunken riot, blaspheming the name of Him who only is his friend, there comes a time when the palsied limb, and the unsatisfied desires are felt, then comes a wish to know as to a future for me! Send for Savonarola! send for the priest! send for that humble man whose life has manifested that the Lord is God, ask him for me, can I be saved? Admitting Christianity to be a system of superstition, its principles are pure, and therefore worth living by; its teachings are consoling, and therefore good to die by!

Among the first to rise in this convention for the defence of the Scriptures was Geo. Storrs, one who for many years had stood for the truth of God, but who for ten years specially, prior to this convention, had lectured and written quite extensively; his life, from his earliest public presentation, had ever been in the defence of truth vs. error, and with a quickened conscience, when to be an anti-slavery man was to be a tabooed man, he boldly advocated the boudsman's cause, and suffered for it! Not at all strange then, that he should rise in this assembly for the defence of that which was arraigned as a criminal—the Bible—and demand by what law this criminal was to be tried! For the information of those who are living, a generation after this occurred, and that they may prize what he then said, I will quote his words.

"You have charged the Bible with crimes. Point us to a clear law by which the Bible is to be tried and we are ready to defend it." The law by which the Bible was to be tried, it was said by Mr. Henry C. Wright, was the law of natural. Mr. Parker Pittsbury, after paying a just tribute of respect to Geo. Storrs, endorsed the words of H. C. Wright.

The whole religious world had been invited to participate in this discussion, yet, if I mistake not, not more than two or three others, of all the clergy or laity as they are called, took sides with Geo. Storrs in the defence of the Divine Origin of the Christian World, that the Bible is of God. One of these was Joseph Turner, who also was dubbed "Rev." with Geo. Storrs, while neither of them claimed the title, as can be proven from the writings of both these men; and personally I glory in them for this; for whether it is a "title of honor," or a "badge of distinction," I am convinced that none have any claim to this distinguishing appellation, other than he of whom it can be said, "Holy and reverend is his name." Just one word in passing. If "Rev." may be used as a prefix to any man or woman, why should such object to "Most Rev.," or "Holy Father in God," or like meaningless titles, unless they be titles of blasphemy, and in this I see one no more or less so than the other!

I would like to quote verbatim the able arguments of both Geo. Storrs and Joseph Turner, in their defence of the Bible, for I consider them sound, terse, and they drive the nail home, every time! Both G. S. and J. T., with thousands of others, have been branded as infidels, and the doctrines believed and taught by them called "pernicious;" to read their writings or hear them preach; those who dared not meet the Hartford Infidels, have in pulpit, prayer meeting, and by the press, warned their supporters and sympathizers to have nothing to do with them! Why? - Because they dared do what they were too timid to do? or for fear their craft might suffer? Facts are stubborn things, and were it not that the tendency of the age is that of the "let us alone" character, there would be no need for such men as Storrs, Turner, and a host of others, who today, by voice and press, are battling for the truth of God as found in the Bible, and opposing the errors of theologians as they have embodied them in "Forms of Faith," "Rituals," and Mummeries of every description!

The "law" by which, at this convention, the Bible was to be tried, was this, "That God has given to man a rule of life, by which if he lives, he will be just what God designed him to be, and that law is incorporated in the physical, intellectual, and spiritual nature of every human being." Mr. Turner said, "If this is the law by which the Bible is to be tried, if in the mind of man there is a law of right and wrong of sufficient authority to allow us to bring the Bible to it, then that law should be universal, it should be found in all human nature; for every mind, every human soul is called upon under such circumstances to render a verdict, or to bear a part in erecting the standard by which the Bible is to be tried." The proofs of fallacy as to the "law" are offered, and the failure whereby the Bible can be tried by this are well presented by J. Turner. He says, if this law is "universal" then those who are called "heathen," as also those who claim civilization in these United States, as those also who are Hindoos, with these also of the most cultured should have one, and only one, rule of determination; need the question be asked, is it so, that all have uniformity of judgment? If those who called this convention were agreed in this, then there might be some show of plausibility; but not there, as the world over, variety and shades of opinion are the ruling characteristics. Mr. Turner also said, "The Bible was not all given in a day, and that it was designed to be adapted to the natures, the religious wants of mankind in all ages of the world, and is given with reference to God's advancing plan in the world. In the Bible we have three kinds of truth: historical, in which we are taught by example; present truth, which informs us of ourselves, our natures, and our relations which we sustain to, and the position we should occupy in the moral government of God; we also have prophetical truth, presenting to us the future. And until the law is fixed, by which the Bible is to be tried, we insist the Bible is the standard by which man is to be tried. For there must be a standard.

Geo. Storrs said, If the trial is by natural religion, I ask you to prove that God is possessed of a solitary moral perfection. Tell me, how by natural religion you are going to demonstrate that there may not be a million gods in the universe? Does natural religion teach that God is good? If so, why so much misery and woe, war, slavery, sickness, death, graveyards! By natural religion you cannot prove that God is good; for aught you know he is just such a being as sanctions war, slavery, polygamy, etc. Natural religion can prove nothing only that there is a God; whether one or many cannot be determined, and that that God possesses power and intelligence, but can lead us not one step further in determining his character. Hence, I say, that the rule by which the Bible should be tried is a defective one, and that the Bible cannot be tested by it. But perhaps I shall hear some one saying, You are not going to compare us with the lower and inferior animals? But sir, what are you but an animal? My friend Wright said, if he did not have any brains, he would have no life; but take away his brains he would be dead, as dead as any other animal. I maintain that man by his creation is only an animal of the highest order, and capable of higher development than any other animal; but as to his having an immortal soul, there is no such thing taught in the Bible; therefore the Bible is clear of that charge. After discussing questions which have come to be to us, who have refused the chaff of the philosophers, as Plato, Aristotle, and others, who have labored to develop a harmony, consistent with foregone conclusions, we find the Bible perfectly in harmony, while ions of every shade are manifestly lacking in this.

Geo. Storrs further said, "The Bible has been complained of on account of its teachings concerning woman. They read to you, on the one side, passages telling the duties of the wife, but they read nothing prescribing the duties of the husband. Paul commanded that husbands should love their wives as they love themselves. It is a dreadful thing for a woman to be loved by her husband as he loves himself! I venture to say that there is not a woman of good sense in this house that will not risk the consequences if she can get a husband that loves her as he loves himself." Again, referring to the account of man's creation, he said, "The old theological notion of there being infants in hell a span long has been adverted to. Suppose we throw the Bible away, and do not let a ray of its light shine upon us, I ask you where your infants go when they die? They go down into the grave don't they? Then all the infants that die go into hell, your natural-religion hell; and you cannot demonstrate by your natural religion but that every infant goes into hell. The infant comes into the world a suffering being, travels on in pain and suffering, and drops into the grave. Now where is your natural religion to comfort you. "Oh, I guess it has a soul that goes off in progression." "I guess!" I guess it is all guess-work. It is the Bible that brings to our view another state, and that by a resurrection through Jesus from the dead.

In reply to Mr. Dorrance, who had spoken, G. Storrs said, Mr. D. gave an illustration of the law of nature as follows: "The blade of grass comes up by a law infixed into its very nature; it does not ask any other blade of grass whether it may grow and expand itself or not. That law is a law that cannot be interfered with." But, sir, here comes up an oak right by the blade of grass, and roots it up and destroys its claims and rights. Is there any law violated there? Suppose we go a step farther. Yonder is a piece of ground, covered with beautiful things that grow well, and this oak comes up, and spreads its boughs far and wide, overspreading the little things, and cuts off the sun from them. Natural religion says it has no business to interfere with them. Does natural religion say that that oak is guilty of a crime? or does it say that the oak has a right to grow as well as the grass and take off the sun from the grass? I am only showing that natural religion, after all, is not a religion or theology by which we can try the Bible. But to travel a little further in this scale of upriseing, we come to the animal creation. Here are the fishes. Every fish has a right to grow; but a big fish comes along, he has the right to swallow down the little fish, and down he goes! Where is the law by natural religion, to swallow down this little fellow? Does not natural religion say he was a "great sinner"?

One of the charges brought against the Bible is that it countenances polygamy! Indeed! Well, how do you know but that that is right? Does natural theology teach the contrary? Travel through the whole animal creation, and do you find anything that forbids it there? I am not here defending polygamy, only to show that the rule by which you claim to judge the Bible is both defective and unreliable. Now if this law means anything it means that you should respect the right of every creature—it means that you should respect the right of the horse, the ox, and the honey-bee; to prove it, put your yoke upon the neck of the young ox, and though he may roar, you good him to do contrary to his sense of right and liberty, and use his services all his life long without recompense or reward. Does natural religion forbid this right of taking the inferior creatures and subjecting them to our use, even to taking away their liberties and their lives? If natural religion does not forbid it, how do you know that natural religion forbids God using man in the same way man uses animals. I admit that when God has promulgated a law, he allows us to use our reason. I also admit that revelation is made to reason, and we have a right to employ our reason upon it. God has constituted man with a capacity for reasoning, but that capacity has to be developed under some system of instruction. Shut up a man, put him where he cannot see his fellowman, then allow years to pass away, see how much he can receive, or how much he knows about right or wrong. Natural religion can never reach the point, or give us one ray of light as to the moral perfections of God! It has not been shown by what law of natural religion, we have the right to take away the self from the cow, producing so much injury to her feelings! How do they know but that this Being who is above us may take away our life when he pleases?

The more I read the arguments of these champions in defense of the Bible, the greater my admiration; and in these days, when the Bible, having undergone such crucial tests as it has, is shining in greater brilliancy than before, having, by many proofs in geological research, and other evidences of a corroborative character, proven itself, as a whole, not of man, but indeed of God, spoke as moved by his spirit, I am the more in love with the Book! And we do well to take heed to it, as the lighted lamp, shedding its rays backward as well as forward.

At this convention, other points were introduced, as to what is inspiration, whether plenary or partial? As to the law of sacrifice, atonement, "woman's rights," slavery, punishment, life, death. The answering of these points, so far as relevant to the discussion, were given by both Geo. Storrs and Joseph Turner, and if advisable I may present these at another time. The "Proceedings of the Hartford Bible Convention" were published in New York by the Committee, and the edition was limited. If any who read the foregoing, have a copy of the book, you own something worth more than it cost; if not in cash, certainly in value which is intrinsic!

LOVE, AND ITS RELATIONSHIP TO LIFE ETERNAL.

"And this is Life Eternal that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." John xvii. 3.

Prof. Drummond, in that very suggestive book "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," treats the above text as a parallel with the definition of Eternal Life as given by Mr. Herbert Spencer from a scientific standpoint. "Perfect correspondence would be perfect life. Were there no changes in the environment but such as the organism had adapted changes to meet, and were it never to fail in the efficiency with which it met them, there would be eternal existence and eternal knowledge."

From this basis he demonstrates most conclusively the harmony that exists between the scientific and Scriptural definitions of Eternal Life; showing, that the only true correspondence in which there are no elements of weakness or decay is to come into harmonious relationship with that which is divine—in short to "Know God and Jesus Christ."

But what is it to know God? Is it to believe that God exists? Is it to know about God—to be able to locate his dwelling place, describe his attributes and tell of his mighty works? Are we to know him through the experience of others; or can we individually and personally come into such a relationship with the Heavenly Father and his Son that from our own experience we can say of a truth that they are known to us?

In answering these questions let us refer again to the text above quoted, and we learn that Life Eternal is a consequence of knowledge of God. Now Life Eternal, or eternal existence, is not natural to man, but is an attribute of divinity. If man is to obtain it he must in some manner be brought into such a relationship with God as to become partaker of the divine nature. A mental, superficial knowledge of God is like faith without works—dead; and that knowledge of God and Jesus Christ his Son that is to quicken the pulses with divine life must be a real vital correspondence that cannot be mistaken as of God.

Much has been written and said about personal experience in learning to know God, and all are familiar with the wonderful tales told in experience meetings; some grotesque, some tragic, and others breathing forth a most earnest spirit of Love and devotion: and amid the medley of "feelings" epistles and convictions the searcher after truth is likely to retire in confusion with no clear answer to his question, "How can I know God?"

Fortunately the Word of Life gives a very explicit answer to the question as recorded in John iv. 7, 8:—"Beloved let us love one another, for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God, for God is Love."

Another and kindred answer is given in 1 John ii. 3-5; "Hereby do we know that we know him, if we keep his commandments. He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him."

From these testimonies we gather that to know God is, First, to manifest the divine Spirit of Love. Second, to keep the commandments of Christ.

The second answer is however comprehended in the first, as Jesus has said, "This is my commandment that ye love one another, as I have loved you. "John xv. 12; xiii. 34; and again, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul and with all thy mind. "This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Matt. xxii. 37, 40.

In a former article I endeavored to show under the caption, "God is Love," how Love is not natural to man but is of Heavenly derivation, and with this thought in view we can see a most significant and beautiful harmony in the Scripture passages under consideration. We have learned that the way of life is to "know God." We have shown that to know God is to manifest the godly attribute of Love; and as "God is Love" whosoever is filled with Love is in that degree a partaker of the divine nature; or as expressed in John iv. 16, "God is Love, and he that dwelleth in Love dwelleth in God and God in him." With this thought to illumine them how radiant do the Savior's words become, "If a man love me, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." John xiv. 23.

It is therefore by this heaven-derived spirit of Love that Christ and the Father make their abode in the hearts of their people, purifying, beautifying, ennobling and transforming until that which was a very charnal house becomes a temple of the living God—and as a result, "As we have borne the image of the earthly so shall we also bear the image of the heavenly." God is eternal—Christ is eternal, and if they "come unto us, and make their abode with us," if we be "in Christ," and "Christ in us the hope of glory," if we be "Christ's" as "Christ is God's" is it not positive that we also shall be eternal; and we can say with assurance, "This the record that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath the life, and he that hath not the Son hath not the life." 1 John v. 11, 12. (R. V.).

Thus by a process of inductive reasoning the close relationship between the questions of Love and Life eternal is clearly established; nay, we may say, the absolute dependence of one upon the other is proven. Clearly as this may be demonstrated however, we are not left to depend upon reason for our testimony, but have a most positive statement of the identification of the two principles given by the apostle of Love in those words, "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death. Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer; and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him." 1 John iii. 14, 15.

To summarize the argument, it has been shown:—

1. That the way of eternal life is to "Know God," or to come into relationship with that which is divine.

2. That to "know God" is to manifest the spirit of Love, for God is Love.

3. That whosoever thus manifests Love is begotten of God, and Christ and the Father dwell in him.

4. That he who thus has the Son of God has eternal life.

5. That this manifestation of Love is a positive assurance of eternal life; and its absence as certain proof of abiding in death.

Love is supreme. It was the motive power that led the Father to save a ruined world. For "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting Life. It is the only law of the followers of Christ; the cement that binds together the living stones of the temple of God; and the manifestation of the spirit of God in humanity. This is God's glorious system of "survival of the fittest"—those only can abide forever who do the will of God, and that will is Love.

In the pyramid of Christian virtues as enumerated by Peter, Love caps the climax. In the list of fruits of the Spirit as given by Paul, Love is the first, as though comprehending all.

Without Love there is no life there is no light, and none can find the way of life. Without Love all human effort is vain. "If I speak with tongues of men and angels, but have not Love, I am become sounding brass, or a clanging cymbal. And if I have the gift of prophecy, and know all mysteries, and all knowledge; and if I have all faith so as to remove mountains, but have not Love, I am nothing."

"And now abideth faith, hope, Love, but the greatest of these is Love." Faith is born of weakness and reaches out to that which is stronger, hope is the child and dependent of faith, and both will cease with fruition; but Love is from God and is eternal. It is as the Spirit of God brooding over the waters of humanity that shall bring forth out of the chaos a renewed and beautified world. To love is to know God; and that approaching day when "all shall know him from the least unto the greatest," and when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea," will be a time when universal Love shall reign, and Life Eternal be the portion of all. God hasten the day!

Brethren and friends! In the light of these testimonies can we add anything to those words which it is related the aged apostle John repeated over and over again as the sum of all godly knowledge. Little children, love one another!

Labor and Liquor.

At present the workingman can hardly make both ends meet. Last pot because he insist on creating capitalists out of the saloon-keepers, and, not content with that, on submitting all his rights of citizenship to the same object of worship? The saloon in politics is the most hideous abuse of the day; but where would it be if the workingmen withdrew their support from it? It keeps them poor, it keeps our politics corrupt. It supplies a constant stream of base adventurers who disgrace the American name at home and abroad. It makes the terms "public office" and "public plunder" synonymous. It stifles progress, fosters pauperism, brutalizes husbands and fathers, breaks women's hearts, puts rags on the workingman's back, disease in his body, and shame and despair in his heart. Yet when labor is most disturbed, when the demand for advanced wages is the loudest, when strikes are most frequent, when hunger and misery are most rife in the homes of the poor, the saloon flourishes still. There may be no bread at home, but there is always beer and whiskey at the bar; and the man who consider themselves victims of circumstances, or the "thralls of capital," squander their earning and spend their savings in these dens.—Atlantic Monthly.

A Race of Little People.

The inhabitants of the Andaman Islands are the smallest race of people in the world. The average height of a full grown Andaman is four feet five inches, and a few weigh over seventy-six pounds. They are marvelously swift on foot, and, as they smear themselves over with a mixture of oil and red ochre, present a very strange appearance. Few travellers care to encounter any of the bellicose little people, for their skill in throwing the spear and using the bow is only equalled by their readiness to attack strangers.

"THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM."

We have arranged with Bro. Wiley Jones to furnish us a limited number of copies of the above named work, to offer as premiums to all who renew promptly for the year 1888. Each one renewing his subscription and paying all up to Dec. 31, 1888, will receive a copy of this excellent work if he wishes it. ## LOOK HERE.

We hope that every one who received a notice last week, will respond without delay.

For the limited amount of Editorial this week we must offer the excuse that we have been afflicted with a severe cold for a few days past.

We republished the account of the "Boy Preacher" from the Indianapolis News. We know nothing in addition to what was contained in that paper.

We are enabled in the present number to continue the interesting story of Isaac Levinsohn from where we left off in October. We reprint this account of the trials of a Jewish youth from the Hebrew Christian, an excellent little Journal printed and published once in two months by Jacob Freshman, Pastor of a church made up of converts from Abraham's children, if we are rightly informed. His place of address is No. 17 St. Mark's Place, New York City.

It is evident enough to every student of prophecy and history that we are now living in the very last times. While we know not the day nor the hour when our absent Lord will return, yet it is nearly susceptible of demonstration that we are now living in the very last generation of Gentile times. Already are the closing events of this age blending with the nearer events of the coming age. The existing generation is living in the conjuncture of ages. Dispensations are soon, very soon to change.

It will be seen from Sister Reed's communication that the Scripture doctrine of Eternal Life through Christ alone is becoming the subject of earnest investigation in Chicago. In a line accompanying her article she says:—"Truly knowledge is being increased. Mr. Reed said this winter that he had never expected to see the time when, after delivering a radical discourse on the nature of man, an Episcopal Clergyman would rise in the audience with kindly words of commendation, and indorse all that he said on that subject. Yet that very thing has taken place here." Many of our brethren are abundantly able to help forward this work that has been commenced in Chicago, and we trust that it will be a pleasure to them to assist in making known a most important truth of divine revelation that has been so long hidden from sight under a mass of ecclesiastical errors.

WORSHIPERS OF BAAL.

"Yet have I left to myself seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed to Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him." 1 Kings xix. 18.

This was God's assurance to Elijah when he had to flee for his life from the wrath of Jezebel after the slaughter of Baal's prophets. Elijah had come to the conclusion that he was the only true worshiper of God left in Israel; but God assures him that there are "seven thousand" left in Israel who have never manifested any allegiance to the idol god of the heathen.

The high priest of that abominable system described as "Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and abominations of the Earth," Rev. xvii. 5—has just been holding an ovation—calling it a jubilee—at which the magnates of the earth have been seemingly vieing with each other in their efforts to pay their homage to the head of the great apostate anti-christian system. It is stated that the aggregate of all the costly presents amounts to $15,000,000.

In 1870 the political supremacy of the Popes was wrested from them, and the recent demonstration at Rome may seem strange in view of the fact that the Popes since that time have been representing themselves as prisoners in the city that was formerly the capital of their domain. The question is why should there be such an effort to honor a dethroned monarch? We can only answer briefly and inappreciably at this time that just such a state of things is demanded in order to fulfil God's word respecting the Great Harlot; and, hence, this strange movement is a striking sign of the times. After becoming depressed to a state of widowhood through the loss of her royalty, in consequence of the crown being taken by force from the head of her paramour, the Pope, she subsequently is so exalted by the adulation she receives from the great ones of the earth as to say in her heart, "I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." Rev. xviii. 7.

It will be seen by reading this chapter through, that her rich gifts, that are precisely so many marks and tokens of the "fornication" of all that bring them, are presented to her, just before the day "when her plagues shall come, and she be utterly burned with fire." The warning voice to all God's true people, is "to come out of her that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." We are glad to have it to say that we believe there are many thousands in the world that have no disposition to bow the knee to this human Baal as did the Queen's envoy, the Duke of Norfolk, who kneeled three times when presenting the rich gifts of gold in the form of a plate and a ewer basin which were used by the Pope in celebrating his Jubilee Mass—that abomination of abominations. These are days of peril; let us keep aloof from Babylon.

Selections.

Syro-Phœnicia and the Land of Israel.

By the mention of a single name in describing a certain unknown woman, Mark vii. 26; comp. Matt. xv. 22, the Gospels open before us a door that leads to a wide field of history. By recording a simple incident connected with that name, they disclose in a quiet but impressive manner the characteristic wisdom of our divine Lord. We have an unexpected incident, brought about in an unexpected manner, and conveying an unexpected lesson.

Evidently the readers of the Gospels at the time they were written would have no difficulty with the words "Canaan," which is used by Matthew, Matt. xv. 22, and "Phœnicia," which is used by Mark, Mark vii. 26; for both names were then applied to one and the same country. Likewise "Syria" had a well-known but much wider signification. To combine the two words, Syria and Phœnicia, as Mark has done, would be to confine the district or region to which this woman belonged within very narrow limits. She was of Syria, but locally from Phœnicia, and there is every reason to suppose that she resided in the district that belonged to Tyre. Beyond this general statement it is not necessary to give exact boundaries; nor could they be given, even were they desired.

The limits of Phœnicia, of the territory belonging to Sidon, of that belonging to Tyre, of that belonging to Damascus, and of Syria itself, varied greatly at different periods. The kingdom of Tyre, as we know, sometimes extended inland as far as Damascus, embracing all the country between, including such places as Mount Hermon, Cæsarea Philippi, and Dan. Kadesh also, the most northern of the three cities of refuge on the west of the Jordan, was probably in Galilee; but in the time of Christ it belonged to the Tyrians. At other times the limits of Tyre and Sidon were confined to the narrow plain lying between the sea and the mountains. The territory of Tyre was small; but, like Palestine, Assyria, Egypt, or Greece, its influence in the ancient world was very great.

The Phœnicians established themselves here at a very early period. Even before Abraham arrived in the land, they were already a prosperous people. An ancient coin of Sidon, in my possession, bears the legend in the Phœnician language: "Sidon the mother of Carthage, Hippo, Citium, and Tyre." Although Tyre was a colony from Sidon, in Bible times it seems to have enjoyed the supremacy in commercial and many other respects.

Friendly relations existed between the Hebrews and the people of Tyre in the days of Solomon, when Phœnician workmen took an important part in the building of the temple. Timber and skilled laborers were needed by the Hebrews, and on their part they could furnish the Phœnicians with necessary supplies which they could not raise, at least in sufficient quantities, for themselves, see Acts xii. 20.

The languages of the two countries were nearly identical, and on this account the inhabitants would be drawn more closely together than they otherwise might have been, even had not this been necessitated by their peculiar geographical position. The chief relation, however, that existed between the two peoples from the earliest to the latest times, was of a commercial character. If we consider an agricultural people on the one hand, and a commercial and maritime people on the other, brought for centuries into the closest relations, as we have, in brief, the conditions upon which these two nations existed side by side.

Historians have noticed the fact that, so far as is known, there was never any war between Phœnicia and Palestine; and, no doubt, the true reason was their mutual dependence upon each other. Phœnicia could not exist without the supplies that came from Palestine; nor could Palestine exist without the market which Phœnicia afforded for the products,—her choice wheat, her honey, oil, and balm. No one presumes to say that these two countries were perfectly harmonious during all the centuries of their intercourse. Where people trade together extensively there will always be some friction; and at times we find the Jews calling the Phœnicians "fraudulent traders," and the Phœnicians retorting by calling the Jews a race of "cheats." Such sharp language, however, never led to hostilities.

Ancient writers are unanimous in praising Tyre on account of his beautiful situation. Earth, sky, and sea combined to make their little "kingdom" an earthly paradise. Behind them were the grand mountains, and before them the great sea, which, in an important sense, was a part of their domain. The heights above were clothed with cedars, the foot-hills with forests of oak, and the plain was attractive by its groves of palm. Flowers and fruit-trees of many kinds filled the gardens and adorned the landscape; and the fields abounded in choice productions, which the rich soil and the favoring climate brought to perfection.

One of the most eloquent passages in the Old Testament, if not in all ancient history, is that where Ezekiel describes the wealth and power, the character and influence, of Tyre, Ezek. xxvi. to xxviii. From the blue waters of the Mediterranean it rose in "perfect beauty." Man gazed with admiration upon its walls, towers, and buildings perfected by her builders' hands. Her seamen were renowned for their skill, and her ships were the wonder of the age. It was the most famous mart in the world. Merchants, and rich, and costly goods from every land, were there,—gold, silver, and precious stones; mineral products of every kind; purple, blue, and embroidered work; costly garments, spices, and scented woods; honey, oil, and balm; wheat, wool, and wine; choice varieties of fish, the fattest of sheep and lambs, and horses of the finest breed. She possessed beauty, wisdom, riches,—everything that heart could desire or name as requisite to the highest development and prosperity to which a city might aspire. To describe the great privileges she had enjoyed, we may use the words which the prophet applies to her king: "Thou hast been in Eden, the garden of God." "Thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire." The man of God counts up the many claims she has to distinction, and the catalogue has all the bewilderment and splendor that one might experience in a dream of Eastern life. All this, however, was worldly glory which had no moral quality.

As a seafaring people, the Phœnicians acquired a knowledge of the world. With this kind of culture there is always connected a certain freedom of thought and liberality of feeling. There is little or no place for severe rules of life. That religion is best which is not too exacting in its demands. The interests of such a people require that they live at peace with all men; and, as a rule, the Phœnicians did not interfere with the religion, government, or laws, of the many strange people with whom they came in contact.

It was but natural that such a people should increase in wealth. They made commendable progress, also, in the arts and sciences, and were not without scholars, historians, and learned men, the loss of whose works, so famous in the ancient world, has ever been regarded as a most serious calamity. They sought out favored localities in the mountains, and occupied them as religious centres; a notable instance being that of Cæsarea Philippi, where they had their altars and practiced their rites long before the place was known to the Greeks. Fountains, caves, and hill-tops, especially about Mount Hermon, were consecrated to Baal-worship. On the other hand, they were the unconscious channel through which the fame of Israel, of its temple, and of that land so full of the wonders of Jehovah, were carried through the world. In the matter of building houses they went to an unprecedented degree of extravagance, which was intimated by at least one town in Galilee,—that of Zabulon, "a place of great beauty, whose houses were modeled after those of Tyre and Sidon," Josephus' Wars, II., xviii. 9. This statement must be supplemented by that of Strabo, who says that the houses of Tyre were many stories in height, "more even than at Rome," where it seems that Augustus, in order to check this strange fashion, found it necessary to issue a decree against it.

But commercial prosperity brought with it many and great temptations to which the Phœnicians yielded until their land was full of immorality and vice. The strict worshipers of Jehovah, who had little connection with the outside world, could not look upon the morals and religion, or, as they felt, upon the lack of both, in Tyre and Sidon, with any degree of toleration. The godly men among the Hebrews regarded those cities as places that were wicked beyond the hope of reformation, —beyond even the mercy of God. They were severe in their judgment, but there is no doubt that in the main they were correct. Those people had abandoned themselves to licentiousness and immoralities of every kind, until they had become as corrupt as any people on earth have ever been.

Worst of all, the forms of irreligion and immorality so prevalent and notorious in those cities were made attractive by all the arts that luxury could devise; and the Hebrews being brought into constant contact with these influences, yielded to them, and fell again and again into terrible sin. The vices that were practiced under the very shadow of the temple in Jerusalem, in the name of the false gods of Phœnicia, were too appalling to be named. It is no wonder that the few who remained faithful to Jehovah cried out bitterly against those who brought moral and spiritual ruin upon their people. It is a noticeable fact that the denunciations of the prophets against Tyre were based chiefly on religious grounds. It is impossible to describe, or even to appreciate, the intensity of feeling which, in the time of our Lord, the Jews cherished towards those cities by the sea, and their inhabitants, because of the things we have mentioned.

It is necessary to have in mind this historical background, which we have indicated only in part, before we can realize the significance of Christ's reference to Tyre and Sidon, in the woes which he pronounced against the impenitent cities of Galilee, Matt. xi. 20.

A CRITICISM.

A communication from my brother George, introducing an article by F. Coghill, in a recent number of THE RESTITUTION, on the wine of the Lord's Supper, is worthy of review.

After certain disdainful allusions to total abstinence, etc., the writer concludes that there is only one wine; viz.: fermented; and therefore but that one is representative of the blood of the Lord Jesus.

A brief glance at any concordance, Young's Analytical specially, will soon disprove the first assertion; as no less than twelve different Hebrew and Greek words are translated wine.

About one hundred and fifty times it is thus translated from the word "Yayin," what is pressed "out, grape juice," this is the Hebrew, and seems not to discriminate between the fermented and unfermented product.

But the strong argument of F. C. is, that the drink offering was of "strong wine," referring to Numbers xxviii. 7, the word "shekar," is that here translated and here only is used! The inference that this was what our Lord used is without foundation. The strong wine here spoken of was that used in the daily burnt offering, having no reference to the Passover.

Further. No command is found for the use of wine at the Passover; it seems to have been a mere incident at the Supper; and as was remarked, the interdiction of all fermentation in the food of the passover, would certainly include fermented drinks!

If then, not an essential part of the passover feast, there can be no authority for identifying it with the "strong drink" of the daily burnt offering. Yet, it may be that the daily burnt offering required fermented wine as expressing the destruction of sin! Leaven, or fermentation, being in Bible figure, expressive of wickedness.

But it is not proven that "strong wine" is intoxicating! Which has most nutritive strength? the unfermented, or the fermented juice of the grape? Every unperverted, natural appetite would give a truthful answer; and even the drunkard would be apt to say "the unfermented," after a few days fasting from nutritious food. Men have been cured of the love of intoxicants, by an over supply instead of food.

We are told in the Bible, that a blessing is in the new wine and surely, a curse is in the old: for, half the crimes on the calendar arise from the direct, or indirect influence of intoxicants.

It is not probable that he who "blessed the wine" of the last supper, ever blessed that, upon which we are forbidden to look "When it is red, when it moveth itself" in its alcoholic development

If any nutriment of strength remains in fermented wine, it is because fermentation is arrested at a certain point! Surely such "wine is a mocker."

If then the argument of F. C., or any who hold with him, rests upon a baseless assumption, it is a mere rope of sand.

At the same time it may be suggested that any part of a command not expressed in detail, and leaving a possibility of a difference of view, cannot be essential to obedience—cannot be a ground of separation, is not part of the faith once delivered to the saints. Schisms are classed among the works of the flesh: a zeal for our private inferences or convictions, may be taken for the zeal of God's house.

To tithe mint, anise, and cummin, may be permissible, if not to the neglect of weightier matters of the law of Christ.

It is certainly blamable for any brother to cast contempt on any reasonable effort to check the license of indulgence in hurtful drinks! and if the blood of the Lord Jesus is better represented by the pure, life giving fruit of the vine juice, then certainly, safety and propriety will be both satisfied by its use.

If fermented wine is not absolutely commanded, the simple juice of the grape must be permissible.

If my own observation is of any value, I might in conclusion add, that those who advocate fermented drinks, for medicine or sacred services, are apt to keep them in the house for "social" indulgence. With all due respect.

A Chance for Charitable Work.

First of all we desire to express our thanks to many of our friends who have responded to calls to send papers into mission fields, both in our own and foreign lands. Every paper sent out is appreciated to the fullest extent by the person receiving it. But in going over our list we find there are still others to whom we hope to be able to continue sending our paper.

We have twenty-nine preachers, either active or who have grown old in the warfare, who as yet are unprovided for this year.

We have fourteen good faithful sisters, all but one widows, some with families of children to support, others old and dependent, each one a worthy member of the body of Christ.

We have twenty-five brethren who are old, or crippled, all dependent on the charity of others, some of whom are inmates of public charitable institutions, each one of whom has, in his better days, been an earnest, active worker for the cause.

Each one of these sixty-eight brethren and sisters look week by week for the coming of THE RESTITUTION, and we cannot bear the idea of dropping them from our list, but it is a load that single-handed we are not able to carry. Neither do we feel like asking those who have already given liberally to do more; but we feel certain that there are some who have been prospered by the Lord in this world's affairs so much that it will be but a slight sacrifice on their part to contribute a little to this cause. We do feel certain that could you see the names on this list it would be but a short time till all would be supplied. You would find the names of quite a number whose articles you have read in our paper in time past, to whose words you have listened as they told the sweet story of Jesus and his love to a dying world.

To anyone who will contribute to this cause, we will send the name and address of the person to whom their money is applied, and they will be able to communicate with him and ascertain direct his circumstances.

Brother, Sister, God has given you health and strength, his blessings he has showered upon you, till every reasonable desire of life is satisfied. He has opened for you, through his dear Son, the pathway to future glory in his soon coming kingdom. Will you brighten the path of some dear child of his by placing THE RESTITUTION in his hands for the year 1888? WHO WILL YOU PAY FOR?

Prepared by the committee appointed by the Indiana State Conference.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 21.

PRAYER.—PART 2.

Q Are there any other examples of prayer offered for definite objects being heard and answered?

A. Yes. Abraham's prayer for Ishmael was answered in the blessing of Ishmael. Gen. 17: 18, 20; the prayer of his servant, in the pointing out of the future wife of Isaac. Gen. 24: 12-20; fire was quenched at the prayer of Moses. Num. 11: 2; Hannah's request was answered in the birth of Samuel. 1 Sam. 1; 27; Samuel was heard in the thunder and rain. 1 Sam. 12: 17. Solomon's prayer for wisdom was granted. 1 Kings 3: 9, 12. Hezekiah prayed for the people and they were pardoned at his request. 2 Chron. 30: 18: he prayed against Sennacherib, and Sennacherib was turned back. Isa. 37: 17, 20, 29; he prayed when sick and fifteen years were added to his life. Isa. 38: 2, 3, 5. Job prayed, and the Lord turned his captivity. Job 42: 10. Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and the interpretation of it was revealed to Daniel in answer to prayer. Dan. 2: 18, 19. Jonah prayed and was saved. Jonah 2: 1, 10; Jesus prayed to the Father and the Holy Spirit was given to his followers. John 14: 16, 17; Acts 2: 4.

Q Are we commanded to pray?

A. Watch ye therefore and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that are coming upon the earth, and to stand before the Son of man. Luke 21: 36.

Q. How are we to pray?

A. In faith, believing that we shall receive the things we ask for. Matt. 11: 24; forgiving, if we have aught against any, that we also may be forgiven. Matt. 11: 26,—for enemies and for those who despitefully use us,—for the coming of the kingdom,—for one another,—in secret. Matt. 6: 6—with others Acts 20: 6—21: 5; 1 Cor. 11: 4, 5; Acts 1: 14; 2: 42; 3: 1; in truth, Psalm 145: 18, and according to God's will. 1 John 5: 14.

Q. How should we not pray?

A. Not for a pretense, or for a show; not with vain repetitions, nor with feigned lips. Matt. 23: 17; Luke 20: 47; Matt. 6: 7; Psalm 17: 1.

Q. Shall we be heard if we ask amiss?

A. James 4: 3.

Q Will God listen to the prayers of those who are living in the practice of sin, even though they may make profession of his name?

A. Isa. 59; 2; 1: 4, 15; Zech. 7: 11, 12, 13; Psalm 66: 18; Prov. 15: 29.

Q What must we do to be heard?

A. Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes, cease to do evil, learn to do well, seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow. Isaiah 1: 16, 17—Zech. 7: 9, 10.

Q Will there a time come, when they that have hated the knowledge of God, who have not chosen the fear of the Lord, who would have none of his counsel, and have despised his reproof, will call, and will not be heard?

A. Then shall they call upon me but I will not answer. Prov 1: 28, 32; Job 27: 8, 9.

Q How can we have the boldness to come to God?

A. Because we have a great high priest Jesus, the Son of God, who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and who was tempted in all points like as we are yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in every time of need. Heb. 4: 14, 15, 16.

Summing up the Lesson, we find that

1. In everything, we are to make our requests know unto God, nothing is too small or trivial to take to him. He is concerned about all the affairs of life,—because by the way we act in our daily affairs, is our destiny to be determined. So he tells us to come to him, and his peace shall guard us; we shall be kept from temptation: we shall be found worthy to stand before the Son of Man.

2. That we are commanded not only to pray, but to pray always, and everywhere, presenting our requests to the Father in the name of Jesus.

3. That we must pray in faith expecting to receive.

4. That the hands that are lifted up to God must be holy hands; it is the prayer of the righteous that availeth; the ears of the Lord are open unto their cry; iniquity separates from God.

5. That God's ancient servants prayed for special objects, and as they were our ensamples, we should do the same, the church should pray for her ministers, and the ministers should pray for the church, and all should pray for one another.

6. That as a vow and living way has been opened, thereby we have boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, we should draw near, with a true heart in full assurance of faith, holding fast the profession of our faith without wavering (for he is faithful that promiseth) so shall we obtain mercy and find grace to help in every time of need.

A. R. UNDERWOOD, Sec'y.

From the report of 1886, issued by M. Faltin, a missionary to the Jews at Kischineff, Bessarabia, we learn that he had interviews with 131 Jews from several different parts of the Russian Empire. Several of these had been baptized, and 2,007 books and tracts had been distributed. An agricultural colony is in formation, where a certain number of these Christian Israelites who are without resources may be able to earn a living. There are, the report states, symptoms of a remarkable religious movement in all parts among the Jews. They are seeking the truth, and many are very near accepting the Gospel, simply through reading the New Testament. This impression is confirmed by some interesting details in the Ami de l'Israel. This spiritual fermentation is very much the result of the testimony to Jesus Christ borne by Rabbi Lichtenstein, Hungary, as well as to the Kischineff movement.

Rev. Paul Warschawski writing from Brighton, England, says:—We are here again on our annual visit, busy with distributing New Testaments, tracts and booklets among residents and visitors. As a rule, the foreign Jews are more friendly towards the missionary, and are ready to discuss religious subjects freely; while the British Jews are, strange to say, not only adverse to, but bitter against the truth as it is in Jesus.

Mr. W. Lethaby, who has undertaken a mission to Palestine, affirms that the Mussulmans are not so fanatical as supposed; but, though very ignorant, they are disposed to listen to the Gospel. A Rabbi asked why Jesus did not show himself to the Sanhedrim after his resurrection, to which Mr. Lethaby replied: "They have Moses and the Prophets; if they will not hear them, neither would they be persuaded if one rose from the dead."

Eternity, it is surely not necessary to remind you, invests every state, whether of bliss or of suffering with a mysterious and awful importance entirely its own, and is the only property in the creation which gives that weight and moment to whatever it attaches compared to which all sublunary joys and sorrows, all interests which know a period, fade into the most contemptible insignificance.

Religion is not a candle to be lighted and blown out at pleasure. It is not a garment, to be put on and off, to suit the company we are in. It is not a flaming torch on the Sabbath and a dark lantern during the week. It is a shining light that giveth light to all that are in a dark place.

"WE SHALL BE LIKE HIM."

We shall be like him. Oh, how rich the promise!
What greater could our Father's love prepare?
Few are the words and softly too they spoken,
But who shall tell the glory hidden there?

We shall be like him, for he took our nature,
To lift us up, and with his glory bless;
He took our sin, oh, wondrous condescension!
That he might clothe us in his righteousness.

He bore our sickness, grieved with our weakness,
That he might give us perfect strength and health;
He walked with us in poverty and hunger,
To make us sharers in his boundless wealth.

We shall be like him, raised above all weakness,
Never past all weariness and pain;
Even death itself shall have no power to touch us
When, like our risen Lord, we with him reign.

While now in gracious love he calls us children,
And we the royal robes with gladness wear,
Faith grasps the promise of the glorious future—
"We shall be like him when he shall appear."

Oh, what has earth our thirsting souls to offer
Compared with that abundant life to come?
How poor its pleasures and how dim its brightness
Beside the glory of our promised home.

Now looking forth beyond time's misty shadows,
With eyes of far-off ages we may sing,
"I shall be satisfied when I awaken,
With thine own likeness, O my God and King."

So, in the hope of bearing his dear image,
Rejoicing in his precious gift of peace,
His love shall keep our hearts in patient waiting
Till we in righteousness behold his face.

SAN DIEGO, Cal., Jan. 16, '88.

Doubtless some of those who read my previous letter touching this gentle land have wondered how it has fared during the recent cold wave that seems to have swept over all parts of the country. Well, the lowest point the mercury reached in this region was 30 deg. above zero, and this was I believe but for a day. Several nights there was a slight frost about like our September frosts in Missouri. But strange as it may seem the flowers still are in bloom in all directions, and the orange, lemon, fig and other fruit trees bear their precious fruits and seem to have braved the biting cold of this unprecedented cold wave. The oldest inhabitants of the western coast in looking back to 1849 say that nothing like the recent cold snap can be remembered. We as yet have suffered no inconvenience from cold, either out doors or in the house, although the hard coal "base burner" has been supplanted by the little oil stove. As I now sit writing even that is turned out as it is not necessary to our comfort. We are more and more delighted with the climate, yet there are many here who seem greatly displeased and are absolutely unhappy and only too anxious to get out of such a terrible place.

Society here I think is largely made up of enthusiasts and cranks (I am rather inclined to be the former.) To the one all the good things are magnified, and to the other they are diminished and the disadvantages are all magnified. This is a comparatively new city and lacks many of the conveniences that are enjoyed in older cities; e. g., there is not as yet a paved street in the city, but they are putting an excellent system of sewerage all through, and when that is completed then we hope to have paved or asphalted streets and good sidewalks. The city proper has a waterfront of about three miles, where commercial business is carried on at a very lively rate the entire year, as there is no such thing as vessels being frozen in or laid by for the winter. To this busy waterfront may be added at least seven more miles, which is of less importance at present, being farther from the business centre of the city which stretches back and up from the bay about one and one-half miles, while the suburbs I believe may be safely estimated at double that distance. At a distance of two miles from the bay the altitude above sea level is about 200 feet. The air is pure, clear and bracing. So far as I have seen fogs are not at all frequent and rise early during the forenoon. I do not remember of seeing fog as late as ten a. m. at any time. From where I now set in our cottage home we can see an almost crescent chain of mountains stretching from northeast to southeast. Towards the northeast these are covered with snow. They are distant forty to sixty miles, and a picture more lovely cannot be drawn by the most lively imagination than these present as the golden setting sun casts his last rays upon them. The most noted of these mountains are San Mc Gill and Table Mountain, which is in Mexico about fifty miles distant. From here it looks like an immense table all ready set for a banquet to nature's children. Mc Gill is so much higher than the rest that when I look on it I think, "The mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains," etc.

Between us and Table Mountain lies an arm of the bay on which the growing National City lies, two and one-half miles from us. It is the southern terminus of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe R. R. We are just six blocks from the bay and between it and our home the above road runs, also a steam motar line of cars which run out into the new additions southeast of here, a distance of twelve or fourteen miles. They make four trips a day each way. There is also a line of horse cars that run every ten minutes one block from us on which you can go down to the wharf where the ferry boat crosses over to Coronada Beach, every twenty minutes. There are now in running order about eight miles of horse car lines and about seventy miles of steam motar as also about fifteen miles of electric motor car lines. These various lines are being constantly added to and new lines projected in all directions. People are still flocking in from all parts of the world and the large majority seem pleased, yea even delighted with all that they behold.

One thing which would seem to throw a damper over the present boom is, that the hotels and public houses were not prepared for the recent unusually cold weather, 30 deg. above zero, and their buildings were not calculated to furnish artificial heat. This mistake no doubt will in time be fully corrected so that travellers need not fear to venture here in winter as well as summer.

There are some cases of typhoid and other fevers in the city. I am fully satisfied that these diseases are not necessary evils of this climate or location, but are in nearly every case brought on by imprudence in diet and exposure for want of sufficient and suitable clothing. Ladies and gentlemen as also children, will step out of their sunny homes on to the cars, ride perhaps two or three miles close to the bay, where the breeze is always cool and then start home in the evening without any extra wrap. Of course the result is a cold which has its course on the weakest part of the system.

Very many have come here in poor health and with little means. They find their means soon exhausted or nearly so and their health but little if any better. Many of these individuals are very incompetent workmen or women, and the consequence is they find it very hard to get employment, and hence are so worried by their circumstances that it is impossible for them to get well and they reasonably enough regret having made the change. For these reasons I say it seems to me unwise to come without either means or health. Yes without some means as health is not always found even here. So far as I can judge the resources of San Diego and its numerous additions, are almost boundless. Nor can I see any likely termination to its present wonderful growth, only that change which we so earnestly look for when the Son of God shall come again and assert his rightful sovreignty over all the earth. I cannot think that even then these beautiful landscapes will be turned into an howling desert. No, no; the curse will be removed and a king shall reign in righteousness and princes shall rule in judgment. Isa. xxxii. 1. What a glorious change when even this lovely land shall be unspeakably more lovely. When Edenic beauty shall be restored in its fullest and most literal sense. Then there shall be no more curse. It is our duty to be diligent in business as well as fervent in spirit. To labor with our own hands that we may have need of nothing and too that we may have to give to those who need.

In this city and its surroundings there are fine openings for almost any kind of manufacturing, and some of our wealthy real estate owners would be glad to make it advantageous to any seeking to establish such enterprises. More anon. Your sister in the faith,

MRS. CARRIE WILLIAMS.

Conditional Immortality Association.

The leaven of truth has been working in for Chicago for some time and we can see some fruits that a few years ago we never expected to see. We now have an organized "Conditional Immortality Association of America." Dr. Fish, our President, is an enthusiastic convert to the (to him) new faith; and although past seventy years of age, is praying to live long enough to undo the evil he has done in preaching endless misery. Our Treasurer is a Methodist minister, also a strong believer. One of our most prominent members is the Rev. J. D. Wilson, rector of St. John's, one of the leading Episcopal churches on the South Side. He delivered an address before the Association not long since in which he took strong grounds. One of the most earnest and active members is Rev. Calvin Blackwell, pastor of the Disciple Church on the South Side. Then we have a few prominent business men and earnest-hearted women. We have both of the deacons of Dr. Larimer's church (Baptist), and at the last meeting one of the deacons of the Western Avenue Church applied for membership. We learn that a goodly number of the members of both these churches are in sympathy with us.

The Association is not a church, or sect. It is simply a society for the promotion of this cardinal truth concerning the nature of man, which is the key-note of much Bible truth. We issue certificates of membership for the purpose of organizing all of the forces and also raising a fund for the publication of tracts and other "campaign documents." A certificate of membership for one year is one dollar, a life membership only five dollars. It is proposed to raise if possible twenty-five thousand dollars to be used in missionary publications. The funds will be in the hands of careful, conscientious business men, who will see that the best results come from every dollar invested. All members have the privilege of buying the publications for missionary work at the bare cost, and it is hoped after a while to be able to scatter quantities of our publications gratuitously. It is hoped that all believers in these glorious truths will send in their address with either one dollar (or more) and receive their certificate of membership and occasional reports of how the good work is gaining ground. Mr. Reed is away for a few weeks, if our friends will send their money and addresses to me I will send their certificates to them, and have their names recorded. The way is opening to do more good than we have been able to do for a long time. Let us all work together and work hard. Yours for truth,

MRS. H. V. REED,
41 Seeley Ave., Chicago.

Youth's Column.

BE KIND.

Be kind to thy father, for when thou wast young,
Who loved thee so fondly as he?
He caught the first accents that fell from thy tongue,
And joined in thine innocent glee.
Be kind to thy father, for now he is old,
His locks intermingled with gray,
His footsteps are feeble, once fearless and bold:
Thy father is passing away.

Be kind to thy mother, for, lo! on her brow
May traces of sorrow be seen,
Oh, well may'st you cherish and comfort her now,
For loving and kind hath she been.
Remember thy mother, for thee will she pray
As long as God giveth her breath;
With accents of kindness then cheer her lone way,
Even to the dark valley of death.

Be kind to thy brother, his heart will hath dearth,
If the smile of thy love be withdrawn;
The flowers of feeling will fade at their birth;
If the dew of affection is gone.
Be kind to thy brother, wherever you are,
The love of a brother shall be
An ornament purer and richer by far,
Than pearls from the depths of the sea.

Be kind to thy sister, not many may know
The depth of true sisterly love;
The wealth of the ocean lies fathoms below
The surface that sparkles above.
Thy kindness shall bring to thee many sweet hours,
And blessings thy pathway to crown,
Affection shall weave thee a garland of flowers,
More precious than wealth or renown.

Dear Youthful Workers:

I think I promised to tell you something more about the meetings that I used to go to when I was a little girl. I wish you could have seen the house. It was always nice and clean, but there was no carpet on the floor, and the walls were rough logs. The cracks between the logs, were stopped up with mud, then boards were nailed over the mud. There was no paper on the walls. The hearth before the fire was made of great flat stones. There was a very large rosebush back of the house, that in the spring-time was always covered with great creamy flowers. Some smaller rosebushes grew in front, not far from the door. These bore lovely red roses.

Well, one time I went to meeting to grandfather's house, and the room was crowded full of folks. Two preachers had come all the way from the state of Michigan, where Bro. Woodward lives. I expect they had seen the pine trees too.

Their names were Hoyt and Miller. I hardly know what it meant, but over the fire place hung two charts, made of cloth, and covered with painted pictures.

One was the picture of a great image, that looked like a man. The preacher said, that the head of this great image was of beautiful yellow gold, its breast and arms, were of shining silver, (just like your mother's castor is made of), the rest of its body, was of bright brass, its legs were of dull iron, and its feet were made of iron and clay mixed.

A king had dreamed about this great image. Then he forgot what his dream was about. He sent for some men that knew lots of things, to come and tell him. But of course they couldn't tell what he had dreamed. They made the king mad. He said all the men should be killed.

You have heard about Daniel, han't you? He was the man that was put into a great den with the big lions, and left there all night. The lions didn't hurt him. God wouldn't let them, he was such a good man.

Daniel heard that the king had dreamed a dream and had forgotten it. He went and told the king to wait and he would tell him what his dream was and what it meant.

Then he went back to his house and told some of his friends to ask God to tell him all about it.

When Daniel went to sleep, God showed the great image to him, and told him how to explain it.

He got up in the morning and went to tell the king. He said "You saw a great image. Its head was made of gold, its breast and arms of silver, the rest of its body and its thighs of brass, its legs of iron, and its feet, part of iron and part of clay. God means you, by that head of gold. You are a great king. But by and by there will be another kingdom. It will not be as strong as yours. That is what is meant by the silver. The third kingdom will rule the whole earth: it is the brass. Another kingdom will be as hard to break as iron: this is what the iron legs of the great image mean. Then a kingdom will come that will be strong in places, and weak in places. It is the miry clay and iron of the feet. When the time comes that the kings meant by the feet are ruling, then the God of heaven will set up his kingdom on the earth."

This is what Daniel told the king about his dream.

It was a curious dream, wasn't it? The preacher that preached in the little log house, told the whole story to us. There were a great many more pictures too. One was a bear, another was a goat. Then there was a picture of a leopard, and of a lion with wings, and one of a dreadful looking beast that had no name.

The preacher said that Daniel saw these beasts, in his dreams. God told Daniel that they meant the same kingdoms, that the great image did, and that the Son of man was coming, after awhile, and all these great kingdoms would be given to him, and his kingdom would last always. I liked to hear that Jesus was coming, and I never forgot the charts nor the preachers. The feast days are ruling now, so we know Jesus will soon be here. Be good little ones, so you can have a place in his kingdom.

STORY OF ISAAC LEVINSOHN.

Upon finding myself alone in the forest, I reflected upon the comforts of home, and began to think that leaving it had been but the folly of my wicked heart, and I cried bitterly to the God of my fathers to take away my life. The more I lamented and prayed, the more did darkness, fear, and misery enter my soul, till, overcome with weariness, I fell asleep.

Then, in my dreams, I saw my dearly loved mother seeking me, and in agitation awoke. Though it was still night I could lie no longer under the tree, but started on my journey. After wandering about for some time the day began to break, and this cheered me. In a few hours I reached a village, and asked if any Jews lived there.

The people told me all the inhabitants were Christians, and most of them Roman Catholics. "I am a poor Jew boy," said I, "travelling to a far country. I have been robbed both of my money and spare clothes, and am perishing with hunger." Immediately the kind villagers offered me meat and bread, which I received with many thanks, but, while holding the food in my hand, reasoned thus with myself, "Shall I be justified in eating bread and meat given by Gentiles?" Then the Rabbi's instructions, together with my parents' words, came to my remembrance, and I begged the pardon of the villagers, and returned the gift, saying, "As I am a Jew, and believe in Jehovah, the God of Abraham, I dare not eat the food." This incensed the people, and the man, on whose threshold I stood, pushed me out of his house.

What was I to do? I determined to destroy myself. Two miles off the village, lies the town of Wittemberg; I took the road to it. On the way I saw a large tree, and I resolved to hang myself on it and end my misery. With this thought in my heart these solemn words flashed before me: "He that is hanged is accursed of God," Deut. xxi. 23, and filled me with terror. I cried to Jehovah to be gracious to me, and to save me from my distress and trouble; and he heard, for these words entered my soul: "I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee," Josh. i. 5, and again, "Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear." Isa. lix 1. Thus encouraged, I went on my way, with the assurance that God was listening to my prayers.

Approaching Wittemberg, my strength almost failed me, for I had eaten nothing since the previous day, and had been walking many miles. On inquiring where the Jews dwelt, I was directed to the Rabbi; he gave me food, and sent me to several Jews, who at once helped me.

Before leaving the town I explained my difficulties to the Rabbi, and besought him to bless me. He asked me many questions, and then put his hands upon my head and pronounced the blessing: "The Lord bless thee and keep thee: the Lord make his face shine unto thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." Num. vi. 24-26. Overjoyed at having obtained it, I went on my journey.

In the evening I reached a small village, and applied for a night's lodging, but having no passport, my application was refused. It was raining in torrents, and during the night I walked about the fields. The town I wished to reach was about three days' journey off; after travelling for a long time I could still see no house, but only a cemetery. Here I lay down upon a grave, and took off my wet coat to dry in the sunshine, and imprudently hung it upon a tombstone. There were a few thalers in the pocket, which had been given me in Wittemberg. Being exhausted I fell asleep, and dreamed again of my mother. She came to me as I slept upon the grass, and besought me thus: "My child, my child, come to me! see your nice soft bed at home!" I awoke, and found, to my amazement, I had been sleeping nearly a whole day, for it was night time. In vain I tried to find my coat, seeking for it in the dark, up and down the cemetery; then lay down upon another tombstone, and so spent the remainder of the night. In the morning I resumed my search, but fruitlessly, and concluded that some passer-by had stolen it during my sleep the previous day.

I was much ashamed at going on without a coat, and the more so, as my clothes were dirty and ragged through their rough usage; I could but go forward, thinking step by step of my father's house and the comforts there.

After a time I came to a small town where, as usual, I inquired for the Jews, and was directed to a certain house. The servant would not let me enter, for I was to all appearance a beggar, but the master saw me and came to the door and bade me come in. Then I burst into tears, for, as I thought of my parents, it went hard to my heart to be regarded as a beggar. I asked the goodman of the house if he would give me something to eat; and this he did, saying nothing but looking earnestly at me.

After some moments he left me, and soon returned with his wife, who too looked hard into my face. He then asked if my father's name was Lion Levinsohn.

"Yes," I answered; "and my mother's name is Brainah."

Then they made several inquiries as to my family, and having heard the answers, the lady burst into tears, and brought her children to see me, and they too wept. "I know your father and mother well," said the gentleman, "for he saved my life in 1863, during the Polish revolution."

They were natives of Poland, and had been persecuted and imprisoned in the revolution, but, at my father's instigation, were released from prison in Koyno on bail, for he was well acquainted with the governor of the prison and the chief of the police. Having obtained their release, my father induced them to leave Russia, and when they were called for, he paid their bail.

"You shall have good clothes at once, and shall be as happy as my own son," said Mr. A., and I was clothed and fed and made at home.

This was on the eve of the Sabbath, and, dressed in good clothes, I went with the whole family to worship in the synagogue. After the service we returned to an ample supper, and I was asked to offer the prayer and praise, according to the Jewish prayer book.

In this gentleman's house I stayed a few days, and thence wrote to my parents, telling them of all that had befallen me.

My father, addressing me as his "dear and soul-beloved child Isaac," replied as follows:

"We received your letter on the eve of the Sabbath. I assure you we did not enjoy any rest on that Day of Rest. As we came from the synagogue, instead of sitting down at the table and celebrating the Sabbath, we all sat down and read your letter and wept very bitterly. Your beloved mother fainted several times, as we were speaking about our precious child. My son, since you have left us, all things seem to be against us. In fact, in whatever your mother and I attempt to do we fail, for our hearts are overwhelmed with trouble to think that you should suffer so much from poverty and hunger, whilst we have good houses and our servants never want anything, for which we thank the Holy One—blessed be his Name. My darling child, I shall be happy indeed if you will think of me, your father, and your mother, sisters, and brothers, and come back home. Then you will make us happy, and you will be happy too. You know how I longed to have you remain in Russia, and be perfectly trained and educated to become a Rabbi, and yet my hopes have gone. Your sister Melita Esther, asks me to beg of you to return, and also your little brother continually cries and asks when his good and sweet brother Isaac will come home. Indeed, my child, when they all cry bitterly for your return I cry with them."

What was I to do? I thought of the trouble through which I should have to pass in order to reach England, yet I felt that I must go on, till the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob would visit me; so I told my parents I felt I must travel much farther, until I could find the satisfaction my soul longed for. I was sure that the Jewish was the only true religion that could save a soul, but I also felt certain that the great God was too holy to look upon so great a sinner as I; adding, I was determined, even if I travelled through the whole world, to seek satisfaction for my soul.

Mr. A., at whose house I found so kind a home, entreated me to remain with him, but I resolved to recommence my travels. Then he begged me to accompany him to the Rabbi of the town, in order that he might bless me, and we visited him.

The Rabbi asked me what had induced me to leave my native land, and requested me to stay with him, hoping that I should find the satisfaction of heart I sought. I told him of my fear of death, hell and judgment, and said if he could do anything to drive it away I should be happy indeed—happier than the greatest king on the throne—and then asked him the same question I had put to my parents and the Rabbi in Russia, "What must I do to be saved?"

"You must obey the holy law given us by God, through his servant, our lord Moses," he answered; "and, if you observe all the precepts of the Law, it will save you."

"Dear Rabbi, all this I have done with all my heart and power, but the more I do, the more fears and terrors of death I have! Something tells me in my heart that all that will never justify me before God."

Finding he could not persuade me, the Rabbi told Mr. A., he thought that hard study in Russia had injured my brain, and that I was going mad. Overhearing the remark, I replied, "Very likely it may be so; nevertheless, I must travel all over the world until I find a cure for my soul." The Rabbi then placed his hands upon my head, and pronounced a blessing, but so softly was it spoken that I could not hear a word.

I had no thought whatever, at that time of distress, that there is a good Physician—One who can heal the leprous soul! The name of Jesus Christ was an abomination to me. Little did I know then how he gives satisfaction to the soul, and delivers them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage.

Upon leaving his house, my kind friend, Mr. A., presented me with a purse full of thalers, and plenty of good clothes, and told me to write to him if I wanted help or money, adding that nothing would be too hard for him to do for me out of regard for the great kindness of my father to him in years gone by; and, with his generous help and promises, I bade farewell to him and his household, and started on my journey toward Hamburg.

DIED.

WAYMIRE.—At Rinehcart, Vernon Co., Mo., January 9th, 1888, Sister Ella Waymire, beloved wife of Brother Chas. Waymire, aged 37 years.

She leaves a sorrowing husband and five little ones and a large family connection to mourn her loss; but Sister Ella, having seen or learned this grand truth her only hope if she died of living again was in reaching forth the hand of faith and partaking of the tree of life, which is the Lord of life and glory. She was baptized in the all saving name for the remission of sins, some seventeen years ago, and having held fast the beginning of the confidence of rejoicing firm unto the end, she now rests in hope of a glorious immortality. She lingered eight weeks of pneumonia. Her last words were, "I am ready to go." We sorrow not as those that have no hope. She sleeps in Jesus, blessed sleep, from which none ever wake to weep. The writer is a sister of the departed one and also your sister in Christ.

MRS. FLORA BROWN.

MOSES.—At Lincolnville, Pa., Dec. 17, 1887, Thomas Moses, aged 95 years.

Brother Moses was born in Connecticut, where his youthful years were spent, and where he married his wife, Miss Rhoda Sturdevant. His first removal was to Ohio, where he remained several years, and in 1838 came to Athens township, this County, where he raised a family of four sons and six daughters. His wife, one son and two daughters preceded him in death. About seven years ago he took up his residence at Lincolnville with his daughter, Mrs. A. S. Geer, where he spent the remainder of his days.

Brother Moses was one of three that entered into an organization in this neighborhood about 1866, as the "Church of God." The other two were Aaron Ellis, author of Bible vs Tradition, and Henry Porter. They all sleep, waiting the resurrection morn. I was away in Kentucky visiting an only brother and his family when Bro. M. died. His son-in-law with whom he was living, came after me, supposing I was at home. This is the reason why I did not preach at the funeral. The last four or five years of his life he lost his mind, yet at times would appear quite rational, especially when talking on the Scriptures, and towards his last would frequently say, O death, where is thy sting, O grave, where is thy victory. He always seemed to know me, and would say, "Why, yes, it is Brother Ongley." The friends of truth said that Elder Shreves (Baptist) did the best they ever heard him. Well, the aged pilgrim is laid away for a little while and soon it will be our turn. Oh Lord, help us to be prepared for what awaits us, and be able to stand in the great day. Yours in hope,

JOHN T. ONGLEY.

THE HEM OF HIS GARMENT.

Lord I come to thee in sorrow burdened,
weary, sore distressed.
Come ere dawning Of the morrow brings my troubled spirit rest.

Chorus:
Glory! glory! Hallelujah, Jesus comes and fills my soul,
Faith has touched the hem of his garment,
and his blood has made me whole.

Jesus to my soul has spoken, fills me with his peace divine,
Yes! the power of sin is broken, I am his
and he is mine.—Chus.

Now I consecrate forever, all I am or hope to be,
And I will forsake thee never, ever more
I'll trust in thee.—Chus.

Christ has come to me in power, cleansed
the stain of sin away,
And with living Rays of fire, fills and thrills my soul today.—Chus.

THE DIVINE WILL AND THE HUMAN WILL.

Since the time of Origen, the allegorical interpreter of the Scriptures, down to the present day, a class of Bible students ranking in point of talent and learning on an equality with their opponents, have endeavored to make God's word teach universal salvation. They have succeeded quite well in argument as against the partialism of Augustine and his orthodox followers, with their eternal torture as the terrible doom of the vastly greater part of Adam's race. Universalists have put the goodness, love, justice, and mercy of God in most damaging contrast with that malignant spirit which in the orthodox theory, consigns nine-tenths of the human race to a punishment so fearful as to shock every sense of goodness and justice in every mind untrammelled by creed or unwarped by prejudice.

Their arguments in favor of the salvation of all men as against the plainly revealed and stubborn fact that death is the wages of sin, are only specious, yet capable of deceiving men who have great pity for human weakness, and who regard man's environment as a sufficient excuse for man's not turning to the Lord with full purpose of heart, even under the full blaze of light and knowledge. I will now in a few words notice one very specious argument alleged in proof of universal salvation, and will if I can spare the time criticise some other arguments which seem to some men quite plausible.

"The will of God controls all things." This statement is supposed to be put beyond successful contradiction by quoting this text in proof: "Who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." Eph. i. 11. The verb "worketh" is in the present tense, yet revelation abounds with testimonies touching the fact that human wills for six thousand years have gone counter to the Divine will, from Adam and Eve, whose one offense brought sin and death into our world, down to the present generation of their sinful children. The very fact of a revelation of the plan of reconciliation and salvation, plainly shows a conflict between the will of the creature and that of the Creator. This going in opposition to the revealed purpose of God is styled "sin," "a violation of the law." God is not the author of sin, but it is here, and in spite of his will. It is not after, nor according to the working of his will, but contrary to it, "Set at naught his counsel," Prov. i. 25, is what destroys the peace and harmony of the world.

If the all things which he worketh after the counsel of his own will include all human wills, and these are controled by the superior will, how is it that there is such a thing in the world as sin? for that is not sin which accords with the Divine Mind. God's energy or will working in the moral and intellectual realm of his reasoning and responsible creatures operates through motives addressed to their understanding with the clear recognition of their power to choose or refuse, obey or disobey. He sets before men life and death, blessing and cursing, and says choose life and live. Deut. xxx. 19. Ye will not come to me that ye might have life, John v. 40. These texts echo the one great leading thought of law and gospel, man's capability of choosing either of two opposite courses, of life, ending in opposite destinies.

God works all things after the counsel of his own will on the divine side of the plan of redemption, but not in controling or coercing human wills by a power of motive against which there could be no resistance, thus making man's salvation a matter of "moral necessity." It is foolish to take this view of the subject when the whole history of the world of mankind contradicts it. The earth is full of rebellion against Jehovah's revealed will, therefore his wrath is revealed from heaven. Rom. i. 18. I wish the reader to keep in mind the fact that the verb in the text quoted in proof, is in the present tense, Eph. i. 11. God works now in the heart of the believer but not in such a way as to coerce the will and make it morally impossible for him to do wrong. "For it is God that worketh in you both to will and do of his good pleasure," Phil. ii. 13.

But God only works in that heart where there is the disposition to co-operate and therefore the need of the apostle's exhortation in the 12th v. "Work out your salvation with fear and trembling." It is God's will that believers should be sanctified that they should abstain from fornication. 1 Thess. iv. 3. That no man should defraud his brother (6th v.) and many other things they were not do, being contrary to the will of God. Now while this "model church" at Thessalonica conformed to the divine will in all its requirements, we know that some of the members of the church at Corinth were for a time unsanctified, were fornicators. 1 Cor. v. 1, were defrauders, (6th chapter 8th v.), and guilty of many things over which Paul shed tears as he penned his letters to that church. But it is claimed that the wills which here held out persistently against God's will, against all good agencies and influences will be made to yield the obedience of faith in another life and under better advantages; but who knows that the "superior will" will overpower then if it does not now? No such conclusion can be drawn from the statement that God works all things after the counsel of his own will, until it can be shown that his will so controls and overrules in its working here as to make obedience a moral necessity and an absolute certainty in all the cases where it operates through his appointed agencies and means. This can not be done; therefore the argument utterly fails and the belief that the entire race of man will be eternally saved finds no support here, and if supported at all in the Scriptures it must be by other arguments. The advocates of this idea which I have been combatting feeling a lack of strength, here begin to talk of "better ballanced brains," more light, fewer and less powerful temptations, and more abundant means of reformation over there than here, for those who fail or fall in this life.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD IN CHRIST.—No. 5.

Again; it will be in place to dwell a little on what follows the resurrection. The resurrection saints and the changed living saints are caught up simultaneously to meet the Lord in the air. We have treated of the translation of the living saints in another essay, but in speaking now of some of the events connected with, and immediately following, the resurrection of the dead in Christ, we shall necessarily include the translated saints, as both will then form one glorious company. The question has doubtless often come up before the mind, as to what takes place in the interval between the resurrection and translation, and the open manifestation of the Christ and his coheirs. Does he remain with his believing people in the air where they meet, or does he descend with them at once to the earth? We believe that he does neither of these things. It is evident that a short period will elapse, probably about three years and a half, though some think much more, before they come to Mount Zion; for it is after the holy ones are taken up, and he that now restrainath,—the Holy Spirit in the Church, hindering until the Divine purpose is fulfilled in reference to the number of the elect rulers,—shall be taken out of the way, that the lawless one shall be revealed, and the unequalled time of trouble shall take place. We think we are warranted in saying that part of the interval will be passed in heaven. We believe that the glorified saints will be with Jesus in the place which he has gone to prepare for them; for when he comes to the earth to fight against the beast, and the kings of the earth, and take the kingdom of the world from its present possessor and usurper, he is represented in Rev. xix. as sitting on a white horse, coming forth in triumph from the opened heaven. He is called Faithful and True; his name is called the Word of God; and conspicuously on his garment and part of his person he hath a name written, King of kings, and Lord of lords. His saints are also represented as following him. "And the armies which are in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and pure." Now we know that these armies are the saints, because in the eighth verse it is said, "For the fine linen is the righteousness of the saints. Holy angels will doubtless be in the procession, but that the risen and translated and glorified saints will be there, is certain. And just prior to this triumphal procession, while yet in heaven, Hallelujah is shouted and repeated by the great multitude; and salvation, and glory, and power are declared to belong to our God. His judgments are declared to be true and righteous, because he hath judged the great harlot. And the multitude rejoice and are exceeding glad, and give glory unto God, because the marriage of the Lamb is come, the blessed union—never to be severed—between Christ and his blood-bought and blood-washed Church. What a wonderful hour that will be for the saints! They will then have reached the highest point of honor. They will then realize the greatest things that God has promised them.

Some speak of believers as married to Christ now, but in this they err. The present state of the Church is one of betrothment to Christ as his bride. Hence Paul says, "For I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy; for I espoused you to one husband, that I might present you as a pure virgin to Christ." 2 Cor. xi. 2. Theophylact, as quoted by Dean Alford, says, "The present is the time of betrothal: the future, that of the nuptials, when the cry shall be, 'Behold the Bridegroom.'"

Again; at this stage of our remarks, another question of deep interest arises, namely, whether Christ and his saints, in coming down to the earth, when the Lord shall punish the antichrist and his allies, and deliver the Jewish people then under their persecuting power, will come down direct from heaven to "the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem." Our belief is that they will not. The parable of the ten virgins sheds some light on the manner of Christ's coming with his Church to the Holy Land, where, be it remembered, "the mountain of the Lord's House shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills." Isa. ii. 2. Now the bridegroom and the bride in the parable, at the marriage, had a number of friends present to witness the ceremony and partake of the feast that followed, and share in the rejoicings of the event. This may represent the marriage of the Lamb in heaven, the union between the heavenly Bridegroom and his bride, the Church, and "they which are bidden to the marriage supper of the Lamb," who are pronounced blessed for being so highly favored. But the bridegroom and the bride in the parable, some days after their marriage, set out with their friends to the house of the bridegroom; his coming is announced at midnight, when he and his bride and the others in the procession were met by the ten virgins, five of whom, being ready, joined the procession and went with them into the bridegroom's house to the marriage feast; this feast also being called the marriage feast the same as the one at the marriage held at the house of the father of the bride, being a continuation of the usual marriage customs. This may represent the coming of the great Bridegroom with his bride, the glorified saints, to their dwelling place in the top, or at the head, of the mountains, where they will drink together the fruit of the vine, and where their union will also be celebrated, and where friends of the Bridegroom will be admitted. And when his coming is announced, a company will go forth to meet him, a part only of which company, however, will be received, the other part not being in a state of readiness or fitness for the presence of the Bridegroom. But a moment's thought will now show the impossibility of a company going forth to meet Christ, or the heavenly Bridegroom and his bride, if they descend direct from heaven to the Holy Land. Men in the flesh could not go up into the air to meet them. How then are we to understand that when the coming of the Bridegroom is announced, a company will set out to meet him; represented by the virgins in the parable? The difficulty to our mind is solved by understanding that Christ and his holy ones will come down to the highway prepared for our God in the desert, or, perhaps, to Mount Sinai, and thence proceed to Palestine along the highway by way of Edom and Bozrah.

EXPLANATION OF LABEL MARKS.

Some having complained that they do not know what the marks on labels mean, we will just say, "Jay" means January, and when it is followed by a figure "8" and reads "Jny6" it means your subscription expired the first day of January, 1886. "Feb" February, "Mar" March "Apr" April, and "May" are well understood, but "Jun" meaning June seems to confuse some, and to be taken to mean January. "Jun" means June. "Jul" is July, "Aug" August, "Sep" September, "Oct" October, "Nov" November, and "Dec" December. The figure following the month stands for the year, "1" means 1881, "2" means 1882, etc. A postal card of inquiry will bring you any information you wish.

BOOKS.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity.
By J. F. Westhoe.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It reads with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its History. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, Realms, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $3.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Eastern Question
In its various phases,—Egyptian, British, Russian, Ottoman, Hebrew, American and Messianic, by J. P. Westhoe. The title of this book gives a good idea of its contents, and the reputation of the author is a guarantee of its worth. The subject as a whole, and in its different divisions is handled in a masterly manner, and the reader is conducted at every step to a right conclusion as to the object of all its topics. The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 240 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $1.50. Send to this office; orders will now be promptly filled, as we have received an invoice of the book, and will send direct from here. The two books, "Coming Age" and "Eastern Question" if ordered together, $2.00.

This work by Dr. Wm. Smith, is just the "aid" to Bible study that you need, and every thorough student should place a copy on his table—you cannot read a chapter in your Bible without coming to some question on which you wish more information, and the best help you can get is Smith's Standard Bible Dictionary. # The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, APRIL 4, 1888. NO. 13.

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS: Per Year ... 75
Per Month ... 10
Three Months ... 25

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

After the Order of Melchisedek and after the Order of Aaron.

It is a very singular thing in the history of ethical Christianity that with all the study that has been given to God's word and all that has been written and published in this field, the Aaronic and Melchisedek orders of priesthood and their moral significance in the scheme of redemption seem to remain as much as ever a sealed mystery. It does not seem to have occurred to the enquirer to look for the key to this mystery in the typical names themselves. Let us see then if we cannot find the key in an analysis of these significant names that have given nomenclature to the two orders, and first the name Aaron. In the Greek the word is Aaron and formed in this way Aaw is an old Epic word obsolete except in a few of its forms and meaning "to hurt," especially "to hurt the understanding." In the middle derivatively "to have the understanding hurt" as by a divine judgment and as a result "to go astray" or "err." Root of this word, Aa, Paw, root of παυομαι, "to strengthen," "to make strong." In the passive, "to be strong." Whole meaning, "damaged strength," or "strength impaired." The "official power" of a person bearing this name then would be an impaired one in its "efficiency."

Now any one at all familiar with the official character and significance of the Aaronic priestly order knows that it ministered to a law of outward forms and ceremonies, and that too to a law that was "inefficient to give life," and that it accomplished its work as a ceremonial law with the fulfilment of the dispensation immediately preceding "The Christ" being then abrogated with the full assertion of the Melchisedek priestly office in the person of "Jesus the Nazarene," of the house and lineage of David. For it is distinctly stated in prophesy as well as divine history that this person has become a high priest "in continuity" or for the whole official term beginning with that period "after the order of Melchisedek," and moreover that "the offering and sacrifice" ministered by him "once for all" is "efficient to give life."

Let us see therefore if the official significance pointing to this result, namely, "righteousness unto life" is not in the very name itself. The word as Grecoized in both the Old and New Covenant Scriptures is Melkysedek. This word analyzed gives us four roots as follows, Mel, χι, σε, δεκ.

The first is from μελω, root μελ, meaning "to care for" or "to have solicitude." χι is the letter χ spelt out according to the Greek and has always been significant of sacrifice, true sacrifice as opposed to the Roman and other idolatrous forms of it expressed symbolically otherwise. σε is the pronoun "thee" in the accusative case, singular number, showing that it is here used in the objective case in relation to the principal verb Helso, also showing that the object of the "solicitude" is individual and not collective. δεκ is the root of the verbal noun δεκτον here used as an adjective modifying the pronoun σε and meaning "acceptable," it being the word always used in the Levitical ceremonial law to describe an offering or a sacrifice that was pleasing to God.

The whole word freely translated would be as follows. "The person bearing this name holds an official position in which he exercises a crucial care that you (you and me) be acceptable." This in connection with the rest of the teaching in regard to "The Christ" makes it clear to us that "this crucial care" has accomplished its object, and that we are "acceptable" even to the extent of obtaining life and to the extent of remedying the inefficiency of the law and Aaronic ministration of it. The Christian "perfectives" as taught in the Melchisedek type and applicable to "those who are Christ's at his coming" as well as to The Christ himself are first "a king of righteousness;" second "a king of peace," and third, "a priest of the Most High God after the order of Melchisedek." Moreover "The Christ" so far as the record teaches is the only one who has as yet reached this "third perfection." On this point, however, we have the very explicit statement namely, "And on the third day I shall have been perfected." And again it seems to be very clearly taught that one at least of the glorified utilities of the "worthy ones" "the little flock" will be to serve as a "Melchisedek priesthood" during the thousand year reign of The Christ, the law they will minister to being "the law of grace or of love upon which hang all the law and the prophets."

The reason, no doubt, why the only one of this very ancient order clearly identified whose name has been preserved and handed down to us has so few details recorded of him, is to emphasize the importance of the few facts we do have, namely the importance of the difference between this order and the order of Aaron.

For instance, a recorded genealogy of the Aaronic order was an imperative condition of legitimacy and the right to serve. Not so of the Melchisedek order. The latter were kings we are to infer from the type as well as priests. Not so the former. The Aaronic order served merely outward forms. Not so the Melchisedek. For it ministered to life. See the account of the bread and wine ministered by Melchisedek to Father Abraham (Habraam). The Aaronic order paid tithes; the Melchisedek received tithes. See Abraham giving a tenth of all the spoils to him.

The Aaronic order served "a tabernacle." The Melchisedek served God directly without any instrumental mediation. There being no record of birth or death in relation to this order the "indissoluble" nature of the life they served is taught, or rather typified, as well as the "continuity," not the "eternity" of the office. There will be no need of a priest or priestly office when sin has been eradicated and this occurs before death is abrogated. "For the last enemy abrogated is death." The whole object of redemption is "to reinstate" the royalty of righteousness" and "the eternal life" is an incident to it, not the ultimate object sought.

"Then said he, lo I come to do thy will, O God." "A body hast thou restored to order for me"—the harmonic Adamic or natural body, namely, free from the discordant weaknesses of sin. He was "the only begotten one," the significance of this being that though begotten "in flesh" and "under law" he received the impulse of the divine, righteous will in controlling measure and degree, enabling him to use the instrumentality of the restored nature) body completely to the glory of God and his own blessedness. In support of this interpretation see Messias (Isaiah) chap. vii. 15, 16.

15. Butter (the condensed wisdom of the word) and honey (the sweetness of this wisdom) will he eat, before he comprehends the bad or prefers it, to choose the good,

16. Therefore before the child hath comprehended good or bad, he will distrust the bad to choose the good, and therefore having chosen the good he does the good perseveringly "unto the end" and attains his first "perfection," namely becomes a "king of righteousness."

To receive this divine impulse of righteous willingness is evidence therefore not only of "the begetting" but "an earnest" of the ultimate "birth" into "the eternal life" of which the Melchisedek priestly office is "a perfection," in due time and order.

And so we have it said that "in this will have we been sanctified." The will is the important factor, the "offering" and "sacrifice" are relatively but concomitants, "where there's a will there's a way."

The Aaronic priesthood served the will of a law of negations, a "law that was added because of transions."

The Melchisedek priesthood serve the will of God exemplified in love, a love whose covenant promises in the Christ are all "yea and amen" in this life as well as the life to come. "All things are yours." The weakness and inefficiency of the flesh counts nothing, if you have "God in you both to will and to do." To realize this and nothing short of this is to be "endued with power from on high" and thus rising to an apprehension of one's high calling" to become a useful factor in working out the plan and purpose of God in time and eternity. The Christian cannot serve a "form." He must serve life and minister to it however humbly. Perfunctory formalism has had its day, and served its end. The Christian must first become "a king of righteousness," then "a king of peace" and then "a priest after the order of Melchisedek." These are the prizes of his "high calling in Jesus The Christ."

MEEKNESS OF CHRIST. No. 2.

In a former article attention was directed to Christ's view of wrong done to himself as sin against God, and his pity for those who injured him by their malice, as potent agencies in adorning his character with the meekness for which he was so distinguished. There was another factor in its production, which had to be reserved for this occasion. It was an inward perfect assurance that at length the unblemished integrity of his life would be recognized by signal tokens of his Father's approval. "He committed himself (or his cause) to him that judgeth righteously." Even during his ministration these tokens were not withheld. More than once, at his transfiguration, for instance, a voice from heaven thus witnessed in his favor—"This is My beloved Son." Moreover, the surpassing glory that enveloped him on that occasion was, when properly viewed, an utterance of the same judgment and loving testimony in symbolic form. But his resurrection, which he anticipated and predicted, was the crowning intimation to earth, and heaven, and extra-mundane wicked intelligences, of the Divine estimate as to his character and mediatorial services. It was followed by his translation from Mount Olivet to the right hand of the Majesty on high,—a solemn rebuke to those who had treated him as a deceiver while he tarried here below, and to all who still deny his claims as the Son of God and Savior of the world. In reward of patience so uniform, and suffering so extreme, God highly exalted him and gave him a name above every name. Having in the midst of his trials the consciousness that his acquittal from every charge was as certain as eternal love and faithfulness could make it, he let the calumnies descend on his head, and the nails pierce his hands and feet, without one look of anger or note of complaint. The hallowed vision of such moral greatness, as we picture it in imagination, is more than we can realize. We are lost in wonder and amazement. His life, till its sorrowful ending, re-echoed the entreaty—"Learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly." His death, so cruel and agonizing, was a silent embodiment of the same truth, which, thank God, has exerted its transforming influence on millions who have pondered over the record of his woes.

Nor should it be forgotten, as we contemplate his mild and dispassionate behavior, that he had force in his arm wherewith he could have smitten the slanderers with dumbness, and withered in death those who consigned him to shame on the accursed tree. But that resistless energy he would not employ for his own defence and his own deliverance. He had to teach the world a sublime lesson of silence beneath unmerited reproaches; the surpassing dignity of enduring in like manner even mortal throes, when they meet one discharging duty with a brave and pious spirit, being confident all the while that by-and-by the just and unerring tribunal will assert the integrity of the martyr, and crown him with unfading honor in the home of the blest.

Let no student of the gentle Nazarene's history confound in his case meekness with feebleness of character. Weak our Master was not. Though he did not rebut the accusations brought against himself, or resent the painful treatment he had to undergo, he was resolute in fulfilling his mission in spite of unrelenting opposition. He could interpose on behalf of others who were endangered, and deliver the most fearless condemnation of those who persistently wronged the poor and the feeble, especially if the crimes were perpetrated in the name of religion. When the armed band reached Gethsemane, and likely gave intimation in some way of their intention to seize his disciples also, though he made no resistance to his own capture, firmly yet with mild speech he took the part of his friends, saying—"If therefore ye seek Me, let these go their way."

Should any wish to observe how indignant he could be at injustice wrought on others, and how boldly he could express his condemnation of sanctimonious rapacity in particular, the 23rd chapter of Matthew's Gospel will furnish all they could desire. In that address these words, and others of like point and vigor, may be found—"Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer them that are entering to go in. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye devour widow's houses, and for a pretence make long prayers; therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation."

With his infallible insight, and Messianic authority, he could speak of transgressors in language his followers would seldom, if ever, be justified in using. We safely allow him to occupy the judgment seat and announce its awful decisions. Let us curb our indignation and be silent, even when we more than suspect the worst; while in our hearts we cannot foster an abhorrence of wickedness too intense, more particularly when it comes into day with solemn looks, and impiously pretends to have God's sanction.

THE SABBATH.

We are told by Sabbatarians that the Sabbath was given at the beginning, from Adam's time; and that we are bound therefore to keep it: because God rested on the seventh day and sanctified it. Gen. ii. 2, 3. The Bible says: Deut. v. 2, 3, that the command to keep the Sabbath was not given to our fathers: that is, it was not given to man as an ordinance, in any way whatever; before it was given to the children of Israel in Horeb; "For the Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day." You will find by reading on in this chapter, that the covenant God made in Horeb with Israel, was the ten commandments, written on stone. And you will find that God lays particular stress upon the reason why he gave them the Sabbath, after giving them the fourth commandment: He says: "And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm: therefore (or, for this reason) the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day." verse 15. The Lord also tells them that the Sabbath was "a sign between me and the children of Israel forever." Again a specific reason is given: that is, "for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth." Evidently to show and teach them that he was the only true and living God, who alone had power to create all these things, and then to stop creating; having finished all his works, he "rested and was refreshed." Exodus xxxi. 18 to 18.

And where is there one jot or tittle of evidence to show that God ever commanded any of the Gentile nations, either in this or any preceding dispensation to observe the seventh day Sabbath? There is none. "The law and the prophets were until John." And we do not find that even the believers and followers of Jesus Christ, were commanded to keep the Sabbath from John to the crucifixion of God's dear Son. Neither were they commanded to keep it after the crucifixion: not by Jesus, the apostles, nor by the comforter, or Holy Ghost, or Spirit of truth, which is to guide the church into all truth; was any one commanded to keep the seventh day Sabbath.

The Apostle Paul who was an able minister of the New Testament, who preached the whole counsel of God, and kept back nothing that was profitable to the church of God, nowhere commands, nor says that we must observe the Sabbath day; but he does positively declare that we are no longer under the law that was holy, and good, the school master which brought us to Christ: but that we are delivered from it, that it was fulfilled, and is dead: that 'Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." Rom. x. 4. The law is "abolished," taken away;" and is not now obligatory upon any one.

Paul further says to his Galatian brethren, that he was afraid of them, that he had bestowed labor in vain upon them, because they had known God according to the Gospel of faith in Christ, and in the promises, but had "turned back again to the weak and beggarly elements" "to observe days, and months, and times, and years." Gal. iv. 9 to 11.

He warns the Colossians not to let any "man judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days." If the keeping of the seventh day Sabbath is of such vital importance to be kept by believers and followers of Christ in this dispensation, why do we not have a single command to keep it in the New Testament? Why no word of warning or of exhortation to Sabbath breakers?

Let us beware how we "put new wine into old bottles;" but rather let us know the truth, that the "Gospel is the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believeth." Rom. i. 16.

J. M. FIKE.

To the Church of God in Christ Jesus, Greeting.

"Hear O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord:and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart....And these words which I command thee this day shall be upon thine heart: and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou riseth up." Deut. vi.

These are the words of the Most High given to his chosen people Israel, through his inspired servant Moses. They are words of wisdom, pure words; and given for the special benefit of the young that they might be instructed in the way of the Lord. Though they were then spoken to Israel after the flesh, and for the avowed purpose of fortifying them against the influence of the surrounding heathen nations, they are none the less imperative, or binding on those who today profess to worship the one living and true God. The allurements of the world are, if possible more besetting than they were in those early times. Every means is resorted to to lead away children and youth from all fear of God or love of his holy works.

To be in and of the world today implies a ceaseless round of worldly pleasures and deceptions, of which Israel, and even our immediate forefathers knew nothing. In this special matter ignorance was surely bliss. Can it be that parents and guardians realize the great responsibility that rests upon them as to the characters formed by those under their care? Are they indeed under their care? or are they not too often wholly uncared for, and uninstructed in the precepts of the Most High? How many can be found among those who profess the One Faith who teach their children when they sit in the house and when they walk by the way? How many papers are published, and little books written in pleasing and instructive style unfolding to their capacities, the wonderful truths—the glorious doctrines set forth in the Book of books? The world and the nominal churches are continually pouring out their vilest fiction, and their silly sentimentalism of piety of such style as to captivate the young. But we look in vain for a counter influence to be exercised by those who profess the One Faith. I have thought much on this subject and it seems to me as much a mystery now as when first I professed to know the truth. Brethren and sisters why is it? Can it be that there is neither ability to write, nor means to publish anything suitable for childhood and youth, that will tend to make more plain the way of life? We do not want anything to take the place of the Blessed Book. No, give it the first place all the time. The many papers, periodicals, tracts and books in circulation advocating the doctrines we believe, do not lessen but rather increase our interest in the written word, and, were they all to be at once blotted out we would feel a very sad loss. Then perhaps we could in some measure realize the want now felt in the classes to which I refer. They have comparatively nothing of Bible literature. Then let me ask, Are we older ones altogether blameless if the minds of childhood and youth are poisoned by false teaching which is not only dishonoring to the Great Jehovah, but is assuredly leading them down to death?

Deeply impressed with the grave importance of the subject I have completed and arranged "A Catechism of the Bible" a part of which came through the "Youth's Examiner" some few years ago. This will be a small book of 75 or 100 pages, containing several hundred questions and answers not according to the "creed books" but answers directly from the Bible.

The fundamental doctrines of the Word are brought out so plainly that any child may grasp them understandingly. The Christ is presented as the seed that was promised in Eden—that it is only through him we obtain the future life—that faith in him as the only begotten Son of God and obedience to his precepts is necessary to enter into that life. That he came as the King of the Jews,—that he was rejected of them. That they crucified him, that he was buried—that he rose the third day as it was foretold of him—that he will come again to the earth and reign upon the throne of his father David. That Abraham and his seed shall inherit the promised land forever, that Israel and Judah shall again be one nation in their own land. That our life in the future comes through resurrection from the dead, not by going to heaven while we are dead—that this earth renewed will be the final abode of all the good, and that the Lord Jesus Christ will be king over all the earth.

The little work has been in the hands of Bro. Underwood as publisher for some weeks past, and I hope soon to hear that it is ready for sale, and when it is ready, I hope the church will send and get them at the price named. By doing this they will enable me to publish something else. Fellow laborers let us not be found hiding our talents—either if coin or ability—in a napkin. Our stewardship will soon be done. Your sister in the one faith,

MRS. CARRIE WILLIAMS.

"I WILL STAND FAST IN THIS FAITH."

In attending our monthly meeting at Gospel Grove, the 18th of March, I was made more than usually happy. The drive is a long one, and we were a little behind hand, but the brethren were singing, as we stopped by the door, and the song seemed like a joyous welcome. We went in and met the bright, expectant faces of the little church and soon after bowed in prayer, and all the outside world was shut out as I plead for a blessing. It came and I rose with tear-wet eyes, to join in singing "When Jesus comes to reward his servants." My thoughts were brought right down to practical subjects, "had I been true to the trust he left me?" The sermon that followed deepened the impression. It was on "the denial of self, as a test of discipleship."

I listened, glad of something to make me stronger for the journey. The benediction was pronounced, then were the warm hand shakes, and kindly words that are worth so much to the weary pilgrim. Reluctantly we said goodby, and accompanied a dear sister home for dinner.

During our conversation, she made the remarks, "I will stand fast in the faith till I die! If I must stand alone I will still stand! The more I read the Bible, the stronger I grow!" It was the culmination of the blessing for me. I was made to rejoice, and give glory to God, and I could not refrain from telling the household about it. This is the spirit that we want. This is the courage that we must feel.

Stand fast in the faith dear ones, stand fast till you die! It will help others to stand, and you will in the end gain the crown.

S. ROXANA WING.

HOLD ON, HOLD IN, HOLD OUT.

Hold on, my heart, in thy believing;
The steadfast only win the crown;
He who when stormy waves are heaving,
Parts with his anchor, shall go down.
But he who Jesus holds through all
Shall stand, though heaven and earth shall fall.

Hold in thy murmurs, heaven arraigning;
The patient see God's loving face,
Who bear their burdens uncomplaining,
'Tis they that win the Father's grace.
He wounds himself who fears the rod,
And sets himself to fight with God.

Hold out! there comes an end to sorrow;
Hope from the dust shall conquering rise;
The storm foretells a sunnier morrow;
The cross points on to Paradise.
The Father reigneth; cease all doubt;
Hold on, my heart, hold in, hold out.

INTEMPERANCE.

WHERE THE CRIME OCCURRED.

Passing sentence on a criminal, Judge Johnston solemnly said, "Nor shall the place be forgotten in which occurred the shedding of blood. It was one of those thousand ante-chambers of hell, which mar, as foul plague-spots, the fair face of our land. Need you be told that I mean a tippling-shop: the seething-place of Satan's minions, the noisome cess-pool, which by spontaneous generation breeds and nurtures all that is vile and loathsome. There for a pitiful sum is furnished that which made deceased a fool, and this trembling culprit a demon. I would not be the owner of a groggery for the price of the globe converted into ore."

A CROWNING CURSE.

Intemperance is a crowning curse. Its horrors have never been fully portrayed. No pencil is black enough to paint the picture, and do it full justice. No tongue is eloquent enough to tell the sad story in all the dreadful details. Drunkenness is a wide and withering curse—blearing the eye, blistering the tongue, deranging the stomach, paralyzing the nerves, hardening the liver, poisoning the blood, congulating the brain, inducing and aggravating many diseases and digging myriads of premature graves. It is a financial curse, draining the pocket, inviting poverty, diminishing comforts, multiplying miseries, filling almshouses and creating hard times. It is a moral curse, clouding the judgment, dethroning the reason, promoting ignorance, producing imbecility, and transforming its victims into maniacs and fools. It is a moral curse, weakening the will, inflaming the passions, hushing the voice of conscience and preparing the way for every vice and crime. The attendant miseries of intemperance swarm like a locust plague. In the slimy trail of the alcoholic serpent you find everything that is dark and dreadful—everything that is regretful and ruinous. You find men without manhood, women without womanhood, age without solace, and infancy without hope. You find want and woe, rags and wretchedness, squalor and filth, disease and death. You find broken vows, broken bones, broken fortunes, broken hearts. You find bad manners and bad morals, bad words and bad actions, bad reputation and bad characters, bad plans and bad performances, bad parents and bad children, a bad beginning and a bad end. Surely intemperance is the crowning curse of American society.

The Future Mission of Israel.

It is beyond all doubt that the Jews are destined, in the providence of God, to be the heralds of mercy in spreading the Gospel among all nations. The disciples were commanded to "preach the Gospel to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." Surely this was a manifest proof how greatly our Lord cared for his ancient people, and how intensely he desired to bring them to the saving knowledge of the great and glorious truth of his salvation. Let us not forget that according to our faith and love for them, will be the degree and earnestness of our prayers on their behalf.—F. R. Gervis, in Gospel Light.

WHILE we may and do differ from many expositors of prophecy, we are more and more confirmed in our first convictions, from reading this volume "Fifty Years in the Church of Rome," that we need not hunt for the "Man of Sin" any further than Rome Papal. In our humble opinion the Papacy fills the bill to an iota. We wish that millions of copies of this work were in circulation. While there are most important revelations for the true Christian in this startling book, there are other revelations no less startling for the liberty-loving American citizen. To write epigrammatically the very "depths of Satan" are fully revealed in this book as existing in the horrible Romish system. The works of H. Grattan Guinness also ought to be in universal circulation. Prof. Westbee's works also.

THE QUESTION OF MAN.

We can form no idea of the formation of any organized being or of any arranged matter without some pre-existing material. Before anything can be formed there must be material. Hence we see that, in the origin of all things, the creation of the material precedes its formation into anything whatever. So far as the Bible teaches us with regard to creation and formation processes it presents us with an account of original matter in a state of the most complete disorganization. We are at first presented with created material in an abyss of formlessness. Not one of the single elemental principles, of which philosophy and chemistry treat in detail, had a separate existence. All was a blended, formless confusion. The divine work was, then, in the first place, to create elementary principles before organizing either inanimate or animate existence. From the formless chaos the multiplicity of simple substances is produced, then these simple substances are formed into organizations, and the vegetable and animal creations are the result, with man as the crowning work of the great Creator's hands.

As about fifteen simple substances, out of the sixty-five or more chemical elements constituting in the aggregate what we call earth, enter into the composition of the human body, creation, in the case of man, means vastly more than merely moulding some soft earth into a human form. While man, in his created completeness, was the consummation of the work on the sixth day, the designed elaboration of the elementary materials was all previously effected, and the grand creative act was the combining and grouping these simples into compounds, and organizing all into that "fearfully and wonderfully made" being, man. In an important sense God was making man all through the six days. He was creating material for bone, blood, brain, nerve, muscular fibre, etc., in mother earth itself. Our great Creator has only made one man in this way, by constituting him an organization out of elementary earths. As the watchmaker takes separate metals and constructs his time-piece, so God took separate substances previously created and constructed man. Woman was then formed out of the man. Then wonders do not cease as all living organizations are procreative. Successive creations originate proximately from first life perpetuated into new forms in a series extending onward and onward.

Infantile organization and life are from a parental source, but how is an infant created into a man? By a creation process, and a most wonderful one, too. The vegetable creation is endued with powers to transform the unorganized earths into organized combinations, and the infant life creates itself out of these combinations. God creates the successive generations of man, less directly than he created Adam, but it is creation still. As the first man was made of separate materials existing in the earth everywhere, scattered, so the increase of the infant in full-grown man comes from its life-powers appropriating nutrition, from combinations for life and material for growth, from all over the world; almost every single individual, in his full development, has been built up from fruits, grains, and other productions from all climates, quarters and zones of the world. God is our Creator, and creation is wonderful.

By Promising Them Life.

Have all men the promise of eternal life? What saith the word of God? The Bible says no. Proof, Ezek. xiii. 22, "And strengthen the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked ways by promising him life." In these days of departure from the old land marks, there are some promising the vilest of sinners eternal life, and by so doing they are encouraging sinners to continue in sin. Jer. vi. 16, "Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls. But they said, we will not walk therein;" and Jesus said, "Ye will not come unto me that you may have life." This is eternal life Jesus is talking about. Now if people will not come to him that they may have eternal life, will he force eternal life on them? John v. 39–40. See Ezek. xviii. 27, "And again, when the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right he shall save his soul alive, because he considereth and turneth away from his transgressions that he hath committed, he shall surely live, he shall not die." These words of Ezekiel are conclusive, that if the sinner will not turn, he shall die, "the soul that sinneth it shall die."

Now if we teach the sinner that God will save all men, whether saint or sinner, then we strengthen the hands of sinners that they should not turn from their evil ways. Jesus says, in John iii. 36, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life," that is eternal life he shall not see. This is the teaching of our Life-Giver. With such statements I cannot teach sinners that they will get eternal life if they continue in sin. Again, 1 John xi. 10, 11, 12, "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son, and this is the record, God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." This stands forever against the doctrine that all men will get eternal life, good and bad. They deny the record. John says, "And this is the record," and then says if men will not believe the record they make God a liar, because they believe not God's record; the record says, "This life is in his Son, then he that hath the Son hath this life, and this life is in his Son, and he that hath not the Son has not got that life in his Son, therefore they have no promise of eternal life. Eternal life is a promise; see Paul in Titus i. 2, "In hope of eternal life, which God that cannot lie, promised before the world began." Eternal life is a promise. Now who gets it? Rom. ii. 7, "To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life is the reward."

Is this promise to all of the race, as they say. Is this the hope of the world as men say in their publications? The world lieth in wickedness, says the record; sinners are without hope and without God in the world. If Christians are commanded to seek for immortality, when all are destined to get it, why strive to enter in at the strait gate, when all are destined to enter in whether they seek or not? Jesus should have said, "Broad is the way and wide is the gate that leadeth unto eternal life, and all go there, good and bad, while strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto death, and none there be who go in thereat." Paul says, "Jesus, being made perfect became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him." Then what about them that disobey? Rom. ii. 8. "But unto them that are contentious and do not the truth," will they get eternal life? No, but to those who obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first and also the Gentile."

Again see Rom. i. 29–31, the worst class of persons, Paul says they are worthy of eternal life? No, are worthy of death. Again, "The wages of sin is death," not eternal life. The apostle Peter says the people of Sodom were reserved to taken, making them examples to others who should live ungodly. David says, "All the wicked will he (God) destroy; the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs, into smoke shall they consume, into smoke shall they consume away."

Dear ones, let us be careful what we teach, lest we strengthen the hands of sinners in their sins. We want to preach more present salvation, and God will take care of the ages to come. "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation; today if you will hear his voice," the record says. Present time belongs to this generation, God will take care of the future. These are perilous times. There are departures from the faith and a loose way of living. It stands us in hand to be on our guard, for there are many ways to lead away from the truth. Let us watch and pray. Take all things to God in prayer. Love to all the dear ones.

Dear Restitution:

I have had it impressed on my mind for some time to drop a few words of encouragement to the dear ones scattered abroad. If perchance I may say a word of cheer for some lonely pilgrim I will be satisfied, as I have often received cheer and comfort from letters in our dear paper, THE RESTITUTION. If we really believe our dear Redeemer is soon coming, if we are watching and waiting for him in expectation sweet, how happy and joyful it is our privilege to be. Wishing, if possible, to lead some poor wanderer to the fountain which cleanses from every stain, may I humbly follow in the Master's footsteps. Although we may be weak and weary of watching, yet are we strong in him in whom we trust. Like one of old, though he slay me yet will I trust him. Although foolish, according to the world's estimate of foolishness, yet wise in the things pertaining to eternal life.

Though by sickness and sorrows and trials oppressed,
When we come to the Savior we feel there is rest;
He has promised us grace as our days may demand,
If we lean on his great and Omnipotent hand.

"These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," Rev. vii. 14. Then, dear ones, if we overcome and hold out to the end, we have the promise of a crown of life. If we fail or come short, then what? O, dear tried ones, let us strive to enter in, yea to seek to be always ready to meet him, for we know not the day when our Lord cometh. The desire and prayer of my heart is,

O, to be ready, ready our dear Lord to meet,
O, to be ready, watching his smile to greet;
Ready and waiting when Jesus shall come
To gather his poor wandering children home.

If we are rooted and grounded upon the Rock, Christ Jesus, then will we be at peace. Then indeed will our hearts be tuned to sing praises to the Lord; then indeed will our conversation be in heaven, whence cometh our help. Then can we lift up our hands crying day and night:

O Thou, our crown of rejoicing!
Come quickly Lord our hearts would say,
And bring, O bring the glorious day,
When sin and strife and death shall cease,
And all creation be at peace.

This I send greeting to the lonely scattered ones. Yours waiting and watching in hope.

"A Better Resurrection."

The saints of the olden time patiently endured the trials and sufferings of their day that they might obtain the better resurrection. If there is a better, then there is one not so good. Paul, the apostle, said, If by any means I may obtain the resurrection out from among the dead ones. There is a common salvation, common to man and animals. Noah's salvation and the Hebrews in Egypt were of this character; men and animals subject to death afterwards. But those who obtain that world and the resurrection out from among the dead cannot die any more but are equal to the angels, etc. The great salvation, the better resurrection.

How to Grow Like Christ.

"The life of a Christian should be one perpetual sacrament. Every moment of his daily life may unite him by faith with Christ, so that his clothing, food, home, friends, work and leisure may all nourish and feed the life within, and bring into his storehouse things new and old, to enrich the mind of the spirit from without. By thus receiving Christ in his providences and his creation, by his outward no less than by his inward teachings, we shall be fashioned after his likeness, and grow to manhood in his kingdom."

PAPAL BENEDICTIONS.

I propose to show that a Papal benediction is often the bitterest curse that can fall on a human heart, and a Papal malediction the greatest blessing; and that, in the very nature of things, it must be so. So long as there are millions of people who believe that Papal benedictions and maledictions are ratified in heaven, it is well to call attention to such facts as the following.

This year of grace, 1868, is the three-hundredth anniversary of the sailing of the Invincible Armada, to bring England under the Papal yoke. Elizabeth was to be dethroned. Mary Stuart, a devout Catholic, was to reign in her stead. The Spanish Inquisition was to be transferred to England, and Englishmen were to be taught to revise their creeds by the ministry of the rack and the stake, red-hot lead and red-hot pincers. The exiled Cardinal of England wrote from Rome urging faithful Catholics to rise and rebel against their government. "The Holy Father," he wrote, "has brought the princes of Christendom to assist him in the chastisement of that wicked monster Elizabeth, the scourge of God and the shame of womankind."

Pope Sixtus issued his bull, and gave his benediction to Philip II of Spain, who undertook to enforce it. Vast preparations were made. Three whole years were spent in building ships and enlisting soldiers. At last, on the first of June, 1588, one hundred and twenty-nine ships of war, bearing an army of 30,000 soldiers, set sail to invade England. The Armada carried 2,430 pieces of artillery. The English fleet consisting of only thirteen ships-of-war, the largest of which was not equal to the smallest of the Spanish galleons. But the English were at home on the sea. God sent a great storm to their aid, and after several day's fighting that storm completed the overthrow of the Invincible Armada. Only 10,000 of the 30,000 soldiers ever saw their native land again; and but a few hundred of the 10,000 who reached their home ever recovered from the hardships and exposure to which they had been subjected. The Papal benediction fell on their heads as a bitter curse. It must always be so till there is a radical change, for the Pope is sure to get what is bad and cursed what is [illegible]

Look at the events of the past quarter of a century—events which have transpired before the eyes of many who read these words—for confirmation of the truth of the foregoing statement.

In the year 1864, we were in the throes of a civil war in the United States. The question whether this Union was to live or die, was being settled on the field of battle. Pio Nono had sent his congratulations to Jefferson Davis. Gladstone, the Premier of England, who is now seeking to give Home Rule, which means Rome Rule to Ireland, had said approvingly, "Jefferson Davis has created a nation." The London Times had printed an editorial headed, "The Great Republic is No More." Now was the opportunity of the Jesuits. The Monroe doctrine could safely be trampled under foot. An empire must be created in Mexico. President Juarez had been doing good work there. Mexico was, under his enlightened rule, emerging from the darkness and superstition of Romanism. The clerical party had been defeated. One-half of the ill-gotten wealth of the Church had been confiscated for the relief of the government and for the education of the people. This would never do. Mexico must have a ruler who could be ruled from Rome. Maximilian of Austria was selected. On April 9, he renounced his rights as an Austrian prince. On the 14th, with his lovely wife, Carlotta, he set sail for his dominions. On June 12 he entered Mexico. Louis Napoleon sent an army under Marshal Bazaine of 10,000 soldiers to seat the new Emperor upon his throne. The Papal benediction was bestowed upon the Emperor and Empress. The little army of Republicans under Juarez was driven to the mountains, and all seemed to be going well.

Despite the Papal benediction, however, Grant kept pounding away at Richmond. Sherman marched to the sea. Lee surrendered April 9, 1865. Johnson soon followed the example of his chief. The war for the Union was over; the Republic was saved. The triumphal procession marched through Washington, but somehow many thousands of the best soldiers were not discharged. Secretary Seward wrote a letter to Louis Napoleon—a very polite letter indeed; but the information it contained in plain, blunt English was this: "If you do not order your troops out of Mexico in short metre, the Grand Army of the Republic will know the reason why." Napoleon obeyed. The order for evacuation was given. Poor Carlotta heard of it. She took a swift steamer and flew to France. Securing the good offices of Eugenie, she gained an audience with his majesty. She implored him not to abandon her husband, the Emperor of Mexico. Eugenie united with her in the prayer. No doubt Napoleon's heart was moved, but he looked at Secretary Seward's letter, and informed the ladies that his order for the evacuation of Mexico could not be rescinded. Carlotta went from his presence a raving maniac. The Papal benediction had fallen upon her, and because it was contrary to the interests of the human race and advancement of the true Church in the world, it was changed to a withering curse. She never recovered her reason. She was a victim of Jesuitical plotting. They brought her to her ruin. Eugenie was walking that same road of peril and sorrow. If a vision of the near future could have been granted her that day, she would have seen the crown of France falling from her own head, and herself bereft of throne and husband, a broken-hearted widow, flying for refuge to claim the protection of a Protestant queen. To such ruin the Jesuits were leading her and the Empire of France. Maximilian, left to himself, without military support from Europe, was speedily conquered, tried and shot, for the Papal benediction had fallen upon him. Heaven failed to ratify that benediction, and it became a curse.

It has ever been part of the policy of the Jesuits to humble any nation which declared for liberty of conscience, which Pius IX in one of his "Encyclicals" speaks of as "that pestiferous heresy." They stirred up the war against Switzerland centuries ago because that little republic refused to bow the neck to the Papal yoke. They stirred up the war against the Dutch Republic for the same reason. In the year 1866, they brought on a conflict between Austria and Prussia to break the power of that Protestant nation. There was no adequate cause for that war, for which vast preparations were made. Three hundred thousand soldiers were assembled to march against Prussia. Papal benediction was sought and obtained. Austria declared war June 17; Prussia answered June 18. On the third of July, less than three weeks from the declaration of war, the battle of Sadowa was fought. It was a most disastrous battle for Austria. Peace was made upon the generous terms of the conqueror. The statesmen of Austria saw a light. They immediately repealed the concordat with Rome. Civil and religious liberty was proclaimed, and the very heresy which the Pope dreaded so much, was introduced into that priest-ridden empire, and today there are nearly four millions of Protestants under the rule of Francis Joseph. Enough leaven to leaven the whole lump!—Zion's Herald.

The Ubiquitious Jew.

It has been frequently remarked that the Jewish race has a wonderful power of adaptation to all climates. Jews are found in all parts of the globe and seem to possess a remarkable facility for acclimatization, even under the most unfavorable circumstances. Mesopotamia is considered the mother country of the Abrahamic family, as well as the cradle of the human race. Some years ago a small colony of Jews were found in the ancient city of Sennar in the south of Mesopotamia, and in the vicinity of ancient Babylon. Of the seventy families composing the colony, one claimed to be descended from King Jeachim, the rest from the house of Levi. A colony of Jews appear to have settled in China about the beginning of the third century of the Christian era, under the dynasty of Han. In 1704, Father Gouseal, a Roman Catholic missionary, found seven Jewish families near Pekin.

In 1686 a Portuguese Jew of Amsterdam named De Paris, discovered a sect of Jews in Cochin China. According to a tradition preserved among them they were descended from a tribe of Jews who had quitted Palestine on the destruction of the second temple. From their long residence in Cochin they had become completely bronzed. These are not the same as the Malabar Jews. The Jewish traveller, Benjamin, sometimes called Benjamin II., discovered a colony of Jews, evidently of Persic origin, in Hindostan. They were known as Babylonian Jews, on account of their having migrated from Babylonia. They observed the essential rites of Judaism, and strictly avoided intermarriage with other sects. In the beginning of the seventeenth century a Jewish colony settled in Cayenne, in the West Indies, one of the most inhospitable climes in South America.

Cayenne was subsequently conquered by the French, who made it a penal settlement, and the Jewish colony was forced to retire to Surinam. Notwithstanding frequent persecutions, Jews are still found in Persia, more especially to the south of the Caspian Sea, where the soil is very fertile but the climate very unhealthy. The principal city is Balprush, where about 150 Jewish families reside in almost complete isolation. They trade with their brethren in Great Tartary and are engaged in the wool and silk trade or in the sale of citrons. They, too, trace their origin from the Babylonish captivity, for, according to a tradition still possessed among them, their ancestors settled in Persia in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, and did not respond to the appeal of Ezra, to return to Palestine. Their mode of life resembles that of the Persians in general. They hold the beard in high esteem, and wear long, flowing robes. They have several synagogues and obtain scrolls of the law from Bagdad. The celebrated African traveller, Mungo Park, found a colony of Jewish families in the heart of Africa, about eighteen hundred miles from the coast. It is no doubt this peculiarity of the Jewish race which induced a French writer on "Medical Geography" to express the opinion that "it is questionable whether the crossing of human varieties confers on the issue constant advantages in relation to the species: for the Jewish race seems in a wonderful manner capable of adapting itself to every change of climate, while others are scarcely able to bear the least change."

The Jew is found in every part of the world; in Europe, from Norway to Gibraltar; in Africa, from Algiers to the cape of Good Hope; in Asia, from Cochin to the Caucasus, from Jaffa to Pekin. He has peopled Australia and has given proofs of his powers of acclimatization under the tropics, where people of European origin have constantly failed to perpetuate themselves. —Jewish World.

A Wonderful Book.

D'Arcy McGee, the great Irish-Canadian orator and statesman who was so tragically murdered, once said: "There is always as a corrective to diseased imagination the Book of books itself—the Bible. I do not speak of [illegible] agreement on all Christians—it is not my place to insinuate religious critics—but I speak of it here as a family book, mainly; and I say that it is well for our New Dominion that within the reach of every one who has learned to read lies this one book, the rarest and most unequalled as to matter, the cheapest of books as to cost, the most readable as to arrangement. If we wish our younger generation to catch the inspiration of the higher eloquence, where else will they find it? If we wish to teach them lessons of patriotism, can we show it to them under nobler forms than that of the maiden-deliverer who smote the tyrant in the valley, or in the grief of Esdras as he poured the foreign king his wine at Susa, or in the sadness beyond the solace of song which bowed down the exiles by the waters of Babylon? Every species of composition, and the highest kind in each species, is found in these wondrous two Testaments. We have the epic of Job, the idyl of Ruth, the elegies of Jeremiah, the sermons of the greater and lesser prophets, the legislation of Moses, the parables of the Gospel, the travels of St. Paul, the first chapters of the history of the church. Not only as the spiritual corrective of all vicious reading, but as the highest of histories, the truest of philosophies, and the most eloquent utterances of human organs, the Bible should be read for the young and by the young at all convenient seasons."

Newton and Voltaire on Prophecy.

It is a singular and most remarkable fact that Sir Isaac Newton, in his work on the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation, said that if the predictions of those books were true, as he knew that they were, it would be necessary that new modes of travelling should be invented and brought into use. And he further said that the knowledge of mankind would be so increased before a certain date or time alluded to in the prophecy, namely the 1,260 years (which most commentators agree in fixing not far from A. D. 1860,) that men would be able to travel at the rate of fifty miles an hour.

Voltaire got hold of this statement of Newton's, and, in the sneering spirit of skepticism, said, "Now look at the mighty mind of Newton, the great philosopher who discovered the law of gravitation; when he became an old man and got into his dotage he began to study the book called the Bible, and in order to credit its fabulous nonsense he would have us believe that the knowledge of mankind will yet be so increased that we shall by-and-by be able to travel fifty miles an hour! Poor dotard!"

Doubtless the sneer of the philosopher infidel afforded a laugh to his skeptical friends, and both he and they probably thought it evidence of his wisdom and of the superstitious weakness of Newton. But the most confirmed skeptic, if he should get into a railroad train today, would be compelled to say that Newton was the wise Christian philosopher, and Voltaire both illmannered and unwise.—American Messenger.

A Letter from an Israelite.

The British and Foreign Bible Society Reporter publishes the following letter, which was written in the Sclavonic character, and sent from Galacia. The letter was sent to Vienna, to M. E. Millard, to be translated, and the following was the translation:

"TO THE HOLY BIBLE SOCIETY, IN LONDON:

"'Behold, I have heard out of the mouth of a true and well-informed man, that the honorable Society is in possession of documents, dating from the times of the Holy Messiah, and containing many proofs of his being sent by the Almighty for our good.

"'Since I heard this, terror has seized upon me. I dread lest we should bring sin upon ourselves by denying him, and lest we should have to suffer for this in the world to come. I have therefore determined to examine those documents so long as a living breath is in me.

"'I am agent for an Insurance Company, but my chief employment is teaching Jewish children. Perhaps my scholars will one day thank me if I introduce this new light to them. Can the whole world be in error? There must be some truth in this thing.

"'May I respectfully request you to send me a Hebrew Old Testament, and also a New Testament in Hebrew, with the German and Polish translation; also some Hebrew and German Prayer-Books, and several instructive books for children in the fourth and fifth classes?

"'I will unveil the new, hidden light gradually to my scholars, and may the Eternal One in Heaven be with the Society and all its supporters.'"

The Hebrew Scriptures have been sent as desired, and the letter itself has been put into the hands of one of the Jewish missionaries at Vienna, and has already led to further correspondence.

With such evidences of awakening life in the broken branches of the olive tree, may we not redouble our exertions and our prayers for the chosen people, assured that if they abide not in unbelief God is able speedily to graft them into the good olive tree once more.

Dear Restitution:

According to the custom of those in this community who are looking for and expecting the soon coming of the blessed Lord, met on the evening of March 29th to commemorate the great feast of the Passover and the betrayal, etc., of our blessed Lord, by partaking of the emblems. And if you had been present and saw the vacant chair, and heard the earnest petitions for our Lord's speedy return to take the reins of government in his own hand, you would have thought that there was a few left on the earth yet who would cry "come Lord Jesus, and come quickly." ## THE SPRING.—John iv. 14.

There's a little spring by the river's side
And it sometimes is hid in the flowing tide,
But the flooded river can do it no ill,
For from far underneath it is welling still.
When the river is bound in an icy hand
That spring still comes welling up through the sand;
And in the heat of the summer's glare
A refreshing coolness still hovers there.
And the little birds pass by the river's brink
And come to the little spring and drink;
They come in gladness and drink and sing
Their thanks and praise by that little spring.

Oh, for a heart that can thus abide
Unmoved by the risings of passion's tide,
That soothing refreshment and strength can bring
To some little wayfarers like that spring,
And in winter's night and in summer's day
Be fed by a Fountain from far away.

MODERN TEACHING REVIEWED.

The religious teachers referred to appear willing to make a compromise with Evolutionists by admitting the probability of all the fixed species of animals, except man, having been developed from the earth by gradual process of evolution! Can believers in the inspiration of the Bible make such an admission as this? The same Bible which informs us that "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground," tells us that "God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth;" and furthermore that "Out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air." The reader will please observe that the same word—"formed"—is used in reference to man, and to every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air.

Now, if the account we have of the creation or formation of beasts, fishes, and fowl be not correct, why should the account of the creation of man be more reliable? And if the narrative of man's creation be doubtful, then must the account of the Fall be equally uncertain; and when you do away with the Fall, the plan of redemption goes with it. Giving upone battery might lead to a surrender of the fort, and a surrender of the fort, to abandoning the citadel to the enemy. Those who make creeds may be willing to give and take in such a way, but those who have no creed but the Bible cannot afford to barter any part of its sacred records.

Again, it is assumed by some that a certain form of election exists in the present age, and has existed in past ages, but in the next age free grace will prevail, and whosoever will may come and drink of life's fountain freely.

Now we confess we are at a loss to see how the offer of salvation could be more free and universal than it now is. Did not Jesus command his disciples to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature, saying, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved?" Mark xvi. 15. "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest?" Matt. xi. 28. And Jesus cried, saying, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me and drink," John vii. 37. Peter said, "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness is accepted with him," Acts x. 34, 35. And Paul says, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation"—to whom?—"to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek," Rom. i. 16.

Furthermore it is said that as Jesus tasted death for every man, "Hence every man is entitled to a new trial for life." Strange, that men claiming to be Bible Students and Bible Teachers should make such an assertion as that! If Christ had not tasted death for every man, how could the offer of salvation have been made free to all? But Scripture and experience show that while pardon and forgiveness are offered to all, a few only accept, while a large number reject the proffered mercy: as Jesus said to the Jews, "Ye will not come to Me that ye might have life."

But we are further told in the same line of argument that of Jesus it is said, "That was the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world," John i. 9. A more correct rendering of this passage, and one that is found in some translations is as follows:—"That was the true Light which having come into the world is enlightening every man." Here we see that the coming into the world has reference to the Light, and not to every man coming into the world. It is the Light that comes into the world, and it enlightens—how many? Every man that accepts it; and that is all that Christ, the greatest of Teachers, claims for it, and he is certainly more capable than any one else of putting a correct construction on the passage. Let us hear his own words, "I am come a light unto the world"—for what purpose?—"That whosoever believeth on Me should not abide in darkness," John xii. 46. And instead of the Light enlightening every man that comes into the world, on the contrary Christ says it will be a source of condemnation to some. "This," says He "is the condemnation, that Light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil; for every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved," John iii. 19.

Having disposed of this proof text for universal restoration, we shall now consider another which has been pressed into the service, namely, "We trust in the living God who is the Savior of all men especially of those that believe," 1 Tim. iv. 10 And the statement has been made, "Here are two classes of saved ones, all the world, and believers." But it must be remembered that the term "Savior" has different significations, and one of them is Preserver: and in accordance with this idea we find in some versions this passage is rendered "Preserver of all men." And if any one will consult the marginal reference at this place in the common version he will see that it gives Psalm xxxvi. 6, as a parallel passage, "Lord, Thou preservest man and beast," which shows plainly that whoever made that reference had the idea of Preserver in his mind, not Savior.

But it is again claimed that the restitution of all mankind is taught in the Bible, and Acts iii. 21, is quoted as teaching the restitution of all things. But so far from this being the case, a careful reader will observe it is the "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began;" or, as the Revised Version has it, "The times of restoration of all things whereof God spake by the mouth of his holy prophets which have been since the world began." So, in order to find out what things are to be restored, we much consult the writings of the holy prophets. It is thus evident that the restitution of all things, much less the restitution of all mankind, is not taught in the passage, but only such things concerning which the prophets have spoken.

Besides, it must be noticed that "every" and "all" are frequently limited, and the extent of their application has to be determined by other portions of Scripture, as for example, "Submit to every ordinance of man," 1 Pet. ii. 13; "Obedient to their own husbands in every thing," Ephes. v. 24; "Children obey your parents in all things," Col. iii. 20; "There went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him," Mark i. 5; "Ye shall be hated of all men," Matt. x. 22. Should magistrates, or husbands, or parents, be obeyed when they command wrong things! And is it not written that "the Pharisees and lawyers" were "not baptized" of John? Luke vii. 30. And must we suppose that good men hated the Apostles, because he says, "Ye shall be hated of all men?" Is it not readily seen that they could be hated of all bad men? Hence, "all" has to be taken with limitation.

In connection with this it is claimed that there will be hereafter a gathering together of all things under Christ, and sometimes the expressions "by Christ" and "through Christ" are used, and reference is made to Ephes. i. 10, which reads as follows: "That in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him."

There can be no doubt that the time is coming when Christ shall subdue all things unto himself, for he must reign until he hath put all enemies under his feet, 1 Cor. xv. 25; but I respectfully submit that the words "in," "by," "through," and "under," are widely different in their signification. In means within, inside, not out; and by would denote the agency or agent by which anything was done or accomplished; while "under" would indicate the relative position of two or more things or subjects. In harmony with this definition of in, we read, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature," 2 Cor. v. 17. "Salute Andronicus and Junia, who were in Christ before me," Rom. xvi. 7. "There is now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus," Rom. viii. 1. "And the dead in Christ shall rise first," 1 Thess. iv. 16. From these it is evident that the term "in Christ" is distinctive, descriptive, and expressive of character, inasmuch as it distinguishes those in Christ from all others; and we could not change the word "in" in these passages to "by," "through," or "under," without doing great violence to the language and its clear import. Thus we see that the phrase "in Christ" (which occurs about seventy-two times in the New Testament), when applied to persons, distinguishes the righteous from the great mass of mankind; as when John says of the one class, "We know him that is true, and we are in him that is true," and of the other, "The whole world lieth in the evil one," 1 John v. 19, 20; Revised Version. So Paul describes the same two classes as the one "in Adam" and the other "in Christ." This leads us to conclude that those "made alive" in 1 Cor. xv. 22, 23, are those that are Christ's at his coming, for each one of them is raised "in incorruption," "in glory," "in power," "a spiritual body." There is no "chance" or probation needed for such risen ones.

Some also claim that Christ taught when the kingdom of God should come, it would be everywhere present and everywhere powerful, yet nowhere visible; and that those who constitute the kingdom will be as invisible as the wind; and it appears that some who teach, also teach that Christ has already come, and is now personally present in the world, although unperceived and unobserved.

In reply to such teaching we would ask, Was Christ not visible after his resurrection? seeing he ate with his disciples, and conversed with them, and was seen of above five hundred brethren at once. And did not his disciples see him as he went up into heaven? And did not the white-robed attendants say, "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven?" He was visible when he went away, and will be as visible when he comes again; and the prophet Zechariah says, "And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives which is before Jerusalem on the East, and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the East and toward the West, and there shall be a very great valley;" etc., Zech. xiv. 4. Can that "very great valley" occur without being seen? And the fact that it has never yet been seen there, is one proof that he has not yet come. Why is his appearing again and again spoken of in the New Testament, and since his glorious appearing, if the kingdom is to be nowhere visible? The spiritual bodies of the risen saints will be as real and tangible as was the body of the risen Savior: theirs being fashioned like unto his glorious body, Phil. iii. 21. He was the first fruits, and the balance must be like him; as Paul says, "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him," 1 Thess. iv. 14. "Even so," that is, in like manner. It is true that Christ could vanish out of the sight of mortal men, and so will his saints be able to do in like manner, but the power to do this does not make them invisible beings that never can be seen; on the contrary, if they were never visible they could not vanish out of sight.

Furthermore, if Christ has already personally returned, then why observe the Lord's Supper any longer? seeing that it was instituted to be observed "till he come," 1 Cor. xi. 26. That he has already come would be sad news to us, for then the dead saints have been raised, and the living changed, and we have been rejected and left behind, and we have no Intercessor now in heaven! no Advocate at the Father's right hand! and we cannot any longer pray, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly!" The time for that prayer would be a long time in the past,—gone, and gone for ever, and nothing would now remain for us to do but to hang our harps upon the willows, and bury our hopes in our unassuaged grief, for our case is more hopeless than was that of the captives of Israel by the rivers of Babylon, as they wept when they remembered Zion. The Revised Version warns us against those who say "that the day of the Lord is now present," 2 Thess. ii. 2.

Another theory promulgated in said Publications, is that during the Millennial Age the resurrection will be going on at intervals, and those awakened from death will have the love of God testified to them, and their individual trials or probation for everlasting life will begin. The line of argument or proof for such a state of probation is both novel and unique. It proceeds somewhat in this way,—"God will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth," 1 Tim. ii. 4; and since the mass of men have died in ignorance, and since there is no work nor device nor knowledge nor wisdom in the grave, therefore God has prepared for the rising of the dead in order to their enlightenment, faith, and salvation. Hence (as they go on to say), his plan is that as through Adam all die, even so through Christ shall all be made alive. I need not here repeat what I have already written on the expression "in Christ," and the differences in, by, through, and under, to show how very inapplicable this passage is for any such purpose. It is true that "the Lord is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." But the same authority tells us that the day of judgment will be the day of perdition of ungodly men, 2 Pet. iii. 7. That does not sound much like restitution of all men. And Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, who is generally considered good authority on such subjects, and well qualified to judge, says, "For as many as have sinned without law, shall also perish without law." When shall this take place? "In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, according to my gospel," Rom. ii. 12–16.

I would kindly suggest to such teachers and their readers to study for a short while the meaning of the word "perish." Webster says it means: "To be destroyed, to go to destruction, to pass away, to come to nothing, to be ruined, to be lost." And having studied and pondered this well, they may then be better prepared to give heed to the solemn warning, "Behold, now is the accepted time, behold now is the day of salvation," 2 Cor. vi. 2, and hereafter "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." And they are not to be favored with a Millennial probation or to have the love of God testified to them for conversion, but are to "be punished with everlasting destruction" for not knowing and obeying, 2 Thess. i. 7–9. What a fatal snare and delusive hope, then, is the theory which offers a premium to present ignorance and neglect of the Gospel!

The idea of a succession of resurrections during the Millennial Age, of companies who shall from time to time be awakened from the tomb, for education and mental and physical development, etc., appears so much at variance with the teaching of Paul and John on the glorious subject of the resurrection, which is a fundamental doctrine of the Christian's faith and hope, and dear as ever to every honest heart, that I would here remind your readers of what they say on the subject. Paul who was inspired of God, and who had such visions of the future as are not granted to mortals generally, ought certainly to be preferred to human speculation. If Paul had believed anything of the kind, we would expect his letter to the Corinthians to read in this way, "But every man in his own order, Christ the first fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming, and then from the outstart of the restitution age to its close, they shall arise in companies, allowing time for their education, and mental and physical development," etc. This would have been the right place to have brought this in, and a pearl of ink would have settled the whole matter. But no: Paul said nothing of this modern invention; hence he passes over the whole period of the Millennial Age and locates the end of the resurrection at its close, just as John does in Rev. xx. 5:—"The rest of the dead lived not until the thousand years should be finished:"—Revised Version.

We have the very best authority for retaining this passage notwithstanding the attempts in the aforesaid publications to cast doubt on its genuineness. It is retained in the Improved Version, upon the basis of Archbishop Newcomb's new translation: in the American Bible Union Version; in the Critical English New Testament, by Bagster & Sons: in the Emphatic Diaglott: in the Revised Version: and in the translation from the Greek Text of Tischendorf (Sinaitic MS.), by Doctor Noyes. All of which are now before me. In the above-mentioned translation of the Sinaitic manuscript, the verse reads thus, "And the rest of the dead lived not until the thousand years were ended."

I believed the text of the Sinaitic manuscript obtained by Tischendorf, which is the oldest Greek manuscript of the New Testament in the world, is considered the best by the majority of competent scholars everywhere.

In keeping with this idea of a protracted series of resurrections, comes another novelty, namely, that those who they suppose will be raised from the dead subsequently to the resurrection of the saints during the Millennial Age, are simply restored or brought back to the original perfection lost in Eden, and will always be of that mortal nature which could suffer the wages of sin (death) if they should commit sin,—in other words, they will have a nature susceptible of death. And we ask in utter amazement, Is this to be the finished work of Christ, to leave myriads of the human race in a condition susceptible of death? And I ask your readers, What kind of a salvation is this? What do you think of it? How would you prize it?

I rejoice to know that he in whom I trust is "mighty to save," he is a strong Deliverer, and his salvation will be complete, and his deliverance absolute. Christ hath abolished death, 2 Tim. i. 10, in promise in the Gospel, and will abolish it, in fact, before he will deliver up the kingdom to God even the Father: "For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death," 1 Cor. xv. 25, 26. And he will not only destroy death, but him that hath the power of death, that is the devil, Heb. ii. 14. And when death and the devil shall have been destroyed, the great and glorious proclamation shall be made to a ransomed world, "And death shall be no more; neither shall there be mourning, nor crying, nor pain any more," Rev. xxi. 4: Revised Version. No aching heart, nor fevered brow shall ever again crave human sympathy, for the former things will have "passed away." And if death shall be no more, then earth's inhabitants shall be deathless, and if deathless, then immortal.

O, who can imagine the universal shout of gladness, rejoicing, and thanksgiving that shall then go up from the redeemed throng, while the hosannas of earth and the allelulahs of heaven shall mingle together in one universal song of praise.

It is saddening to think that so much error is published and put into the hands of so many who are ill prepared to detect and expose its fallacies. O, that men would drink from the pure crystal fountain of divine truth (instead of from human fountains), taking God's message direct from the prophets, Christ Jesus, and his apostles; always looking unto Jesus, and allowing him to be not only the Author, but the Finisher of our faith as well, and as gladly abide by his teaching, without wandering into the unprofitable fields of human speculation and uncertainty, but resting in Christ as the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the ending, the first and the last of the Christian's hope and expectation.

We deplore any theory or system which by seductive insinuations, and far-fetched inferences, beguiles men away from the plain utterances of Jehovah. And I would impress upon your readers so to discipline their minds that their thoughts, words, and actions may be subordinate to his will, and bow submissively to his purposes; for his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure.

Trusting that the foregoing may be instrumental in awakening in the minds of many a closer, more earnest, critical, and reverential study of the Scriptures, I subscribe myself. Yours for the Truth,

R. McLAUCHLAN.

DOVER, Del., March 12, '88.

Brother Chaplin:

I sit down on this tempestuous day to talk awhile with my pen to the readers of THE RESTITUTION, of which you are the beloved and honored "head." May God in his mercy spare you to fill that place (if his will be so) till the great and glorious "Head over all things to the church" "shall take to himself his great power and reign;" then may you be permitted to share with him the glory and honor in reserve for all the faithful, the "overcomers." My heart is sad while I think of the suffering there is all over the earth in these closing days of Gentile rule. Such terrible things as are constantly transpiring, especially since the dawn of 1888, ought to make us pray more fervently than ever, "Thy kingdom come," and if they do not, we certainly are not right in the sight of God.

A friend handed me a paper last Friday, containing an account of the conversion of a Jewess under the preaching of D. L. Moody, and a remarkable incident that transpired. (I will enclose the piece). I asked the man for the paper that I might read it myself. When I took up the paper in the evening to read, the first thing that my eyes fell on were, "Terrible Scenes," "The Fire in the Union Building, Springfield, Mass.," "Six Persons Lose their Lives," "The Foreman and Proof Reader Burned to Death." I became very much interested, as I am acquainted with many there, and read the terrible details with a throbbing heart, but cannot express my feelings when I read the proof reader's name, Miss Gertie Thompson (18 years of age), and the thought flashed across my mind that she was the beloved daughter of Brother Thompson, who used to be one of the most interested readers of THE RESTITUTION. He and his wife I used to count among my best friends in the truth. Have not seen them in several years, but oh, my feelings when I read that name, and was sure it was their interesting and beloved child.

We cannot understand these wonderful providences. My prayer is that it may be sanctified to those afflicted and agonized parents. How could a father witness such a scene—his own child burning to death in his sight, yet beyond his power to reach—and not become insane, but by the grace of God? Dear brethren and sisters, ought not the things that are constantly transpiring in these days, some of them so shocking, quicken us to watchfulness and prayer? The end of this age is certainly drawing very near, and oh, that we may live in such readiness as to exclaim, "Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly." The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all.

We append the clipping alluded to and leave it for our readers to judge as to its credibility:

WAS IT A MIRACLE?

Rumor as a general thing has a reputation for veracity which is none of the best, says the Louisville Post, but the following bit has been told me by reliable persons for the truth, and, if true, proves that the age of miracles is not past. During the Moody meetings a young Jewish lady of high connections in the city became converted to Christianity. Her parents, grown gray in Judaism, were furious at her apostasy from the faith of her fathers, but their wrath was impotent to turn the purpose of the young recusant. Soon after her conversion she bought a New Testament and took it home, and going to her room sat down before the fire that filled the grate and was burning brightly, and began to read.

In such an occupation her mother found her. She was in high dudgeon on the instant, and, snatching the sacred book from the girl's hands, she threw it among the flames and the glowing coals. Then for fully ten minutes, so runs the rumor, she berated her daughter, who, girl like, buried her face in her hands and wept. After the scolding mother had gone out of the room the young lady sank into her chair and began to meditate sorrowfully. Suddenly her eyes fell upon the grate, and there, through her tears, she saw her Testament unburnt. She snatched it, in surprised joy, from the fire, and lo! the flames had not even scorched it. Such is the story of the miracle. I give it to you for what it is worth. I have heard a minister of the gospel vouch for its truth.

Dear Restitution:

February 5th commenced meetings in the Myers school house in Calhoun County, Mich., about three miles from Burlington, in a neighborhood where there had been no religious meetings for five years. Our last meeting gave them fifteen discourses besides a lecture on the labor question from a Bible standpoint, in the Methodist Church in Burlington with a good audience and close attention.

The meetings at the school house were crowned with success. A goodly number were specially benefitted; two precious mothers of families were constrained to begin a new life. The interest continued to increase until the close; extra seats had to be provided. The careless ones were quickened into a new activity. They now have regular prayer meetings with their numbers increasing. The few that have been holding on to the blessed hope a number of years are greatly encouraged in view of what the Lord has done for them. I find it blessed to labor for the Master whenever and wherever the door may open. The loving fervent spirit of the Master will pave the way among all the true children of Christ of every name. If we present the truth in love, it will find a lodging place in some hearts that are honest. We must by sound argument convince the intellect and it will make its way to the affections of the heart. If we go out in the spirit of discussion we merely take the chances of any lasting benefit.

The spirit of the Lord was in the meeting from the first to convince of sin and the necessity of obedience, baptism included, in order to be saved. I enjoyed a blessed liberty in presenting the glorious truths we hold dear, holding back nothing that was profitable. The Lord blessed his word and I will praise his blessed name. Yours in the blessed hope.

BRAND.—At Milledgeville, Carroll Co., Ill., March 11, 1888, Frances Lotta Brand, aged 34 years, 10 months and 7 days.

The deceased was born in Green Co., Wis., May 4, 1853. She was the third daughter of the writer. About 1872 she embraced the faith and was baptized into the all-saving name of Jesus the anointed by Brother Geo. Cratsw. In 1873 she was married to Boswell Brand, of Carroll County, Ill., where they have resided since she commenced and established her Christian character in the Abrahamic faith, which faith she never abandoned though she was influenced to unite with the German Baptist Church where she held her standing till the time of her death, and her funeral service was conducted by the German Baptist minister, X. Livengood, of the Progressive Order. She leaves a husband and three children, two sons and one daughter, and a large circle of friends to mourn her loss. But we sorrow not as those that have no hope, for she died in full triumph of a living faith that she should soon meet her friends where death will come no more.

The Presbyterian Witness, Halifax, N. S., says: "Of Father Chiniquy's new book we must frankly speak in superlatives. It far surpasses in interest any book hitherto issued by the author, and if we do not misjudge, it is sure to become a standard work relative to the internal economy of the Roman Catholic Church. The great organization of which he formed so brilliant and popular a member is laid bare in its innermost workings. The unveiling is in all cases profoundly interesting; it is not always distressing or humiliating. The book is brilliant on every page with the genius, and the rhetorical skill of the gifted author. The narratives are vivid and fascinating, and many chapters are of tragic interest." "Adherents of the Church of England should read this book in order to realize the meaning of the Confessional. Presbyterians and others should read it to see the unwisdom of sending their daughters to Convent and Nunnery Schools where the training is so superficial as it is shown, and where the chief aim is to win the public over to the Church of Rome." ## THE SUBJECT OF LIFE.

The stream is calmest when it nears the tide,
And flowers are sweetest at the evetide;
And birds most musical at close of day,
And saints divinest when they pass away.

Morning is holy, but a holier charm
Lies folded close in evening's robes of balm,
And weary man must ever love her best,
For morning calls to toil, but night to rest.

She comes from heaven, and on her wings doth bear
A holy fragrance like the breath of prayer;
Footsteps of angels follow in her trace,
To shut the weary eyes of day in peace.

All things are hushed before her as she throws
O'er earth and sky her mantle of repose;
There is a calmer beauty and a power
The morning knows not, in the evening hour.

Until the evening we must weep and toil—
Plow life's stern furrow, dig the weedy soil—
Trawl with and feel our rough and thorny way,
And bear the heat and burden of the day.

Oh! when our sun is sailing may we glide
Like summer's evening down the golden tide;
And leave behind us, as we pass away,
Sweet, starry starlight round our sleeping clay.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 28.

WATCHFULNESS.

To WATCH—"to observe" "take heed," "keep guard," "be awake," "be sober," "be vigilant."

Lesson Chapter, Heb. ii.

GOLDEN TEXT: Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip. For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward; How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by those that heard him.

Q. What ought we to do?

A. We ought to give the more earnest heed to the things we have heard. vs. 1.

Q. Why should we do so?

A. Lest at any time we should let them slip. vs. 1.

Q. What about the word spoken by angels?

A. The word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward. vs. 2.

Q. Can we escape, if we fail to watch?

A. How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation, which was first spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed by them that heard him. vs. 3.

Q. How should we live in regard to Christ's coming?

A. Therefore let us not sleep as do others; but let us watch and be sober. 1 Thess. 5: 6; also Matt. 24: 42, and 25: 13.

Q. What armor should we put on?

A. The breastplate of faith and love, and for an helmet, the hope of salvation. 1 Thess. 5: 8.

Q. How then should we live?

A. Be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer. 1 Pet. 3: 4-7.

Q. Why is it always necessary to watch and pray?

A. That ye may be accounted worthy to escape all the things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man. Luke 21: 36; and Rev. 3: 2, 3.

Q. On what should we take heed?

A. Lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. Luke 21: 34.

Q. Why did Christ tell his disciples to watch and pray.

A. Lest they should enter into temptation. Mar. 14: 38.

Q. Upon what especial servant of the household, does the command "to watch" rest more than upon any other?

A. Upon the porter: or the man that has charge of the gate or door to the house,—the minister, Mark 13: 34.

Q. Upon whom is a blessing pronounced?

A. Upon those whom the Lord when he comes shall find watching. Luke 12: 37; Rev 16: 15.

Q. What are we to be watchful about?

A. To strengthen the things that remain, Rev. 3: 2; to stand fast in the faith, to quit ourselves like men, 1 Cor. 16: 13, and to keep our garments, Rev. 16: 15, in short, we are to be watchful in all things. 2 Tim. 4: 5.

Q. What will happen if we do not watch?

A. The Lord will come unexpectedly and find us sleeping.

Closing text:

And what I say to you, I say to all, Watch.

SEEDS.

We are sowing, daily sowing,
Countless seeds of good and ill,
Scattered on the level lowland,
Cast upon the windy hill;
Seeds that sink in rich, brown furrows,
Soft with heaven's gracious rain,
Seeds that rest upon the surface
Of the dry, unyielding plain.

Seeds that fall amid the stillness
Of the lonely mountain glen;
Seeds cast out in crowded places,
Trodden under foot of men;
Seeds by idle hearts forgotten,
Flung at random in the air;
Seeds by faithful souls remembered,
Sown in tears and love and prayer.

Seeds that lie unchanged, unquickened,
Lifeless on the teeming mould;
Seeds that live and grow and flourish
When the sower's hand is cold;
By a whisper now we blessings,
By a breath we scatter strife;
In our words and looks and actions
Like the seeds of death and life.

Thou who knowest all our weakness,
Leave us not to sow alone!
But thine angels guard the furrows
Where the precious grain is sown,
Till the fields are crowned with glory,
Filled with mellow, ripened ears,
Filled with fruit of life eternal
From the seed we sow in tears.

Check the froward thoughts and passions,
Stay the hasty, heedless hands;
Lest the germs of sin and sorrow
Mar our fair and pleasant lands,
Father, help each weak endeavor,
Make each faithful effort blest,
Till thine harvest shall be garnered,
And we enter into rest.

Dear Little Workers:

Keep on working for Jesus and he will guard you through your life and keep you from all evil, if you try to trust in him and live up to his word.

LULU QUACKENBUSH.

THE STORY OF LUTHER, NO. 4.

Dear Youthful Workers:

We left Luther in our last letter to you, in what would seem to us great danger. But you remember what I said about God's having a great deal of work for Luther to do, do you not? He has not got that work done yet, and God is going to keep him safely, no matter how much the Pope may want to have him killed.

The German people had great meetings called Councils, or Diets, where the Emperor and all the great men met to make laws. Luther said he would go before this Diet and have his case tried.

The Pope did not want the Council to meet. If it met, it would be the same as saying that the Council had more power than he had, but Charles, the new Emperor of Germany, wanted to please his German subjects and so he called the Council.

It met in an old city called Worms. Luther went in a carriage with three of his friends. When he got to the city of Weimar, some men were nailing up a paper from the Pope, that said "No one was to have anything to do with Luther."

His friends tried to get him to go back. They told him, "he would be burned to death," but he answered that "he would go on, though his enemies should make a fire, flaming to the skies all the way from Wittenberg to Worms." "He would pass through it to behalf of truth and in the name of the Lord."

When he was in sight of Worms he stood up in the carriage and sang,

"God is a castle and defence,
When trouble and distress invade,
He'll help, and free us from offence,
And ever shield us with his aid."

Wasn't it a nice song? You can see from the words just how Luther felt. He knew God would help him, and hide him when danger came. Ever so many people went out to meet him, a great many more than went out to meet the Emperor. The old town was full of people. They were looking out of every window. The streets were so full that no one could get through. Everybody wanted to see Luther, the man who had written so many books, and who was preaching such strange things. He had to be taken through the gardens to get to the Council. The Pope's men had wished he would stay away. They didn't want him to come.

They told the Emperor of Germany "to seize him at once." The Emperor had promised Luther that he should not be hurt if he would come. No one could get him to break his word.

When Luther went into the Council, he found the greatest crowd met that had ever been seen in Germany. There were more than two hundred of the great men of the world there. One of these asked him if he had written some books that were lying on a table close by? He said he had. The man told him that he must take everything back. He said, "He could not and he would not take anything back, God helping him." "Amen."

The Council met again the next day. Luther's case was to be decided, now. He had dared to think and to say that "the Pope could not forgive sins." He believed that if a man left off sinning and obeyed God he was forgiven. The Bible taught him this. He knew it was true. God had said so, and he was not going to give it up.

The Emperor Charles was angry. He was the one who had to tell what should be done with Luther. He said "it was wicked in Luther to stand against the faith of all Roman Catholic people." "He would give up all that he had; his kingdom, his money and his life, to stop such wickedness." He said "no one must give Luther anything to eat or to drink; no one must help him in any way." As soon as the time had gone by during which he had promised Luther that he should not be hurt," anybody might 'seize him.'"

Some of the great men of Germany did not like this. They were a part of the Council. They thought Charles might have given them a chance to say something about Luther's case.

They thought they would do as they pleased any how. So when Luther was going home they sent men on horseback after him. The men took him out of the carriage, put a cloak on him and made him get on one of their horses. Then they rode off with him just as fast as they could. They rode back and forth, and everyway, so that no one should find out where they had gone. They never said a word. It was in the night. They took Luther to a stone castle and hid him. They made him put on other clothes. They called him Knight George, instead of Martin Luther. They told him to let his hair and beard grow, then they went out.

He was treated kindly, he was given plenty to eat. His friends thought he had been put to death, but the bad men did not know where he was. Their plans had failed. They intended to kill him, but God put it into a great man's head to hide him. The time had come for him to do some more work for God. He could do it in this old castle, shut in from everybody, better than anywhere else.

The bad men think he will trouble them no more." What do you think he did? He took a Latin Bible and wrote it all out into the German language, so that his people might have it to read and might know for themselves that he had told them the truth. That Book would give the bad men more trouble than anything he had ever done.

Luther was shut up about a year. His friends kept on writing and preaching all the time that he was gone. They were very glad to have him come back.

He worked awhile longer and then he died. People read the Bible; they blessed it, they would no longer mind the Pope. He had a great many of them put to death, but that did not stop the work that Luther had begun. It only made more people see how bad the Pope was, and what a bad faith he must have. Luther has been dead about three hundred and sixty years. In that time three hundered and sixty million copies of his translation of the Bible have been printed, and bad men can no longer keep people from reading it. But it has been a long, long story, and I know you must be tired. Good-bye. Your loving friend.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. P. Westhes.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profuse wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. Its analysis largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also outlines that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fulfillment of immutable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $1 00. Send to this office for this work.

The Eastern Question

In its various phases,—Egyptian, British, Russian, Ottoman, Hebrew, American and Messianic, by J. P. Westhes. The title of this book gives a good idea of its contents, and the reputation of the author is a guarantee of its worth. The subject as a whole, and in its different phases, has been treated in a masterly manner, and the reader is convinced at once that the author has spared no labor in the study of his topic. The work is thoroughly done and any one who carefully reads the 640 pages of this book will be well repaid. It is just the book for the time in which we live. Cloth binding, clear, pleasant type to read, and good paper. Price $2.50. Send to this office; orders will now be promptly filled, as we have received an invoice of the book, and will send direct from here. # The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, APRIL 11, 1888. NO. 14.

THE RESTITUTION
TERMS: One Year, $2.00. Six Months, 1.00. Three Months, .50.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Communications.

Letter from Mexico.

I have had several enquiries about this country and will answer them all at once through the columns of THE RESTITUTION.

I do not think there is a country anywhere with greater possibilities than Mexico. The mineral wealth of the country is very large. The gold and silver mines of the country have been worked for many hundred years, long before the conquest by Cortez. Yet what has been done hardly amounts to a "prospect."

Perhaps one third of the land in Mexico is good for agricultural purposes. The country is mountainous. The valleys are almost uniformly rich and well adapted to raising all kinds of grains. Grass does not grow as abundantly as it does on our prairies, still sheep, cattle, mules and horses do well here. The grass is very nutritious. Many of the mountain sides are good grazing lands. All fruits, including tropical fruits, do well here. Vegetables of all varieties can be grown at all seasons of the year. There is very little timber. Some places oak, pine and other varieties are found equal to the very best, but there is not much comparatively of this kind of land. Most of the timber is very scrubby. Our people would not call it timber. As a rule, the water in Mexico is not good. Where we are it is very good, but this is an exception. Most of the land requires irrigation to make it produce. This, however, is not as expensive as persons not accustomed to it would suppose. The natives build dams and in this way make large ponds or lakes, which fill up during the rainy season. In this manner they secure water for irrigating purposes.

The climate is comparatively good. The winters are very pleasant; the sun is hot in the summer, but from my experience here last July and August, I think I can stand much more fatigue here out in the sun than I could at home. It is always pleasant in the shade and the nights are cool. I was in the city of Mexico in August last and did not suffer half as much from heat as I did in Chicago. The altitude makes the difference. At Vera Cruz and on the coast, a northern man could not live during the summer season if he exposed himself to the sun. The yellow fever prevails along the coast but there is none of it in the interior. The prevailing diseases are lung trouble and bilious diseases in a light form. Small pox is very prevalent, more or less, at all seasons of the year, but worst in March and April. The natives do not mind this disease very much. It is not as severe on them as it is on white people. An old physician, who has had a large experience in treating small pox here, told me that if a person was vaccinated in Mexico they would not have the small pox in even a light form. I doubt the statement, however. Persons coming to Mexico at any time of the year should be vaccinated before coming. There is no reason why small pox should be worse here than elsewhere except the uncleanly habits of the people. In the cities all persons are required to be vaccinated. No sanitary measures are taken to stamp the disease out when they have it and hence it lies dormant ready to break out at any time.

I have never met a Mexican who had consumption. The high altitudes are hard on the lungs and the natives have colds and some times a little throat trouble by reason thereof, but it is not permanent. The natives wrap their blankets over their mouth and nose in the mornings and evenings to protect their lungs.

The native Mexicans are nothing like the "greasers" met with in Southern California, New Mexico and Texas. The "greaser" is an half-blood Mexican. The general notion which prevails among our people that the Mexican people are slow, indolent, ignorant, and dull of comprehension is a mistake. I never met a more active people than these. They do not do very much for the very good reason that they haven't much to do, but they never let an opportunity pass to earn a shilling. They are quick-witted and will excel a Jew in their trading and dickering. They know nothing about doing anything on a large scale, for the reason that they have never had any experience in that direction. They are very quick to learn. Like the Chinamen, you never have to learn them but once. Teach them the right way the first time and you have no further trouble. Their language consists very largely of shrugs of the shoulders and motions with the hands. A person who is apt in these things and knows a few words of Spanish, can make himself understood without difficulty. Their language is very expressive, one of their words answering to many words and sentences in our language.

They are comparatively peaceable. Like all people living in the tropics or semi-tropics, they are quick tempered. But they live on vegetables and haven't that blood thirsty disposition that people have who eat large quantities of meat. The liquor they drink is said to be the worst in the world—in my judgment there is none anywhere that is good—and when they become intoxicated, like all drunk people, they lose their senses and quarrel and fight. They never fight with their fists but with some kind of deadly weapons, usually stilletos, and frequently kill each other. Human life among them is cheap, still I do not think there is any more, perhaps not as many, murders in Mexico as there is in Chicago in proportion to the population. The laws are well executed as a rule. The word of the officer is the law. The government has within the last year or two taken very vigorous measures to break up the bandit bands that have heretofore infested this country. When caught they are shot at once without ceremony. The result is that away from the Texas border life is, with a little precaution, as safe as it is in the States.

It is the policy of the government to encourage the investment of capital here, especially in mining enterprises.

In answer to the question, "Is Mexico a good country for our people to move to?" I answer, No. While nearly everything can be cheaply produced here, from the growing of cotton, wheat, corn, barley, rye, oats and everything else down to green peppers, there is no market except a very little near the cities and where there are large mining works. Then again you can't compete with labor at eighteen cents per day. That is the price farm laborers are paid, and they get very little of that in money. Our people would use in a single month what these people will live upon a year.

When reading Sister Woodward's words of encouragement to the afflicted ones, it occurred to me that God wanted for a special work in the age to come a few tried ones, tried as it were by fire. Our dear Savior was made perfect by suffering. Our Heavenly Father does not afflict his children to no purpose. The Lord doeth all things and all he does is well done. He will surely reward us for all that we do and all that we suffer for him. In view of all these things should we not be cheerful and contented with whatever may come to our lot, always rendering to the Master the very best service in our power. How very, very many blessed words of encouragement we find in the chart that points out the way that leadeth to that better life. Hear our blessed Lord when he says, "Let not your heart be troubled, ye believe in God, believe also in me." Do we believe in Christ? If we do, will we let our hearts be troubled when he so kindly requests us to believe in him and thus drive trouble away? When he comes to receive us unto himself, as he says he will, can we meet him and say, "Dear Savior, I took you at your word, I believed in you, I knew that you had gone to prepare a place for me and I knew you had promised to come back and receive me unto yourself that I should be ever with you. I have waited patiently all these years. I have done all I could to lead others to the end and make them patient and happy by pointing them to the blessed promises that you left on record for us." May the Lord help us all to patiently wait his sure coming, ever keeping our armor bright with constant use in his service. Your brother in hope of eternal life.

WHO IS THE SINNER?

It is easy enough to get an individual to admit that somebody else is a sinner; that somebody else is violating God's law by lying, or swearing, or defrauding his neighbor, but that he, himself, is a sinful man, the very idea is preposterous! But look here, my friend, what does the Bible say about it? It says just this, that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." How are you going to get away from that "all?" Does not that include you? Does not that mean that you have sinned? You Mr. David Thompson, and you, the Hon. Henry Clayton?

Knowing God, have you glorified him as God, have you been thankful to him: have you worshiped and served the Creator more than you have the creature? Have you obeyed God in loving him with all your might and mind and strength, and in loving your neighbor as yourself? Have you?

There is a righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe. Have you that righteousness?

You are commanded to believe the gospel, to repent, to be baptized, to live a new and blameless life; to love the brethren, to suffer for Christ's sake, to let the light of truth shine out from you to others, to meet with God's people, to pray, to be not conformed to the world.

You are not obeying him in one of these things; how then are you righteous? how then have you become justified before God?

God is only the "justifier of him that believeth in Jesus," and to believe in Jesus with acceptance to God, is to believe in him by obedience. There must not only be the faith but also the following. Faith without works is dead; it amounts to nothing, it neither justifies nor saves.

But you say "you are not a bad man, you do not lie, nor swear, nor drink rum, nor defraud your neighbor. You are honest and respectable."

"You have never been irreligious, you go to church, and give of your means to every good cause. You help the poor, and care for the sick." "You cannot see what more is required."

But see here, my dear, self-satisfied friend, has God ever said that he would justify you by works without faith in the Gospel, and that, an obedient faith? If faith does not save without works, neither does works save without faith.

The righteousness of faith comes only upon those that believe. You have got to be clothed in the righteousness of the sinless one, before you can hope for salvation. So long as you are without Christ, you are without hope. So long as you are without Christ you are a sinner.

"There is one way and only one for both respectable and non-respectable sinners."

You must render to God that which is due to him. You must make application for pardon through Jesus the Savior, before you can have any ground of acceptance with God.

The name of Jesus is the only name through which you can come; his merits the only merits that you can plead.

You cannot walk into God's presence claiming salvation, because you have lived a pretty fair clean life without Jesus.

The righteousness upon which you are resting, would be found a very foul and tattered garment, when you got there, it would not cover your sins at all.

Sin is the violation of God's commands, it is disregarding what God has told you to do.

You are violating his commands. You are not doing a thing that he has told you to do.

Who then is the sinner? It is you, it is you. You are ashamed of Jesus and of his words, believe, repent, and obey, lest he "be ashamed" of you "when he shall come in his own glory and in his Father's and the holy angels".

Take the narrow path that leads to life, break off your sins by righteousness and your iniquities by turning to the Lord.

S. ROXANA WINCE.

Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried. Dan. xii. 10.

The entire fulfilment of Daniel's prophecy is undoubtedly near at hand. "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" is being asked by the saints scattered abroad. And while no exact date is given them, they still watch and say, "What shall be the end of these things?"

The voice of prophecy answers and gives them a star to guide. "Many shall be purified and made white, and tried, but the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand." Since the days of the apostles there never has been a time in the history of the church, when so many of all denominations were seeking light and purity as at the present time. "If we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth from all sin," 1 John i. 7.

What a coming out from the world and taking Christ as a complete Savior has been going on the past ten years. And yet the prophet says the wicked shall do wickedly. And wicked church members as well as wicked people who have never joined a church, have been persecuting the pure ones, and opposing the purity taught in the word. But the pure ones, the tried ones, stand firm with shining faces, and shining lives. With hands uplifted for God and his word, with the one they point back to the cross, saying "He died to purify us," and with the other they point upward to the clouds, saying, "Behold he cometh to receive us."

The doctrine of the second coming of Christ is being preached in all churches as never before, and yet may who profess to follow God, are among the wicked who do not understand, and are saying, Where is the promise of his coming?" They are making no preparation to meet him, and seem not to be concerned about that church that is to be holy and without blemish. Eph. v. 27. But the wise shall understand. And while the cold professor, the careless worldling, and the scoffing infidel, are neglecting the dear old Bible, the guide book, and are pursuing their business, and following after the pleasures of this life, as if there was never to be any change, the wise are studying the prophesies and the plan of the atonement, and are making preparation for a great change. Dear readers let us be among the wise that shall understand. Now is the time to be purified and made white. "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

HEAVENLY REALITIES.

We are invited to share a perfect sympathy with the Bridegroom of our souls, to have a complete oneness of interest with him in all that concerns his kingdom and glory; as well as live continually upon his grace, holiness, wisdom, power, and love. Just as we live our natural lives by breathing in the air that surrounds us, unconsciously, more often than consciously, we may still live and move and have our being in Christ, even when we are necessarily occupied with other thoughts and duties; and be ready, the instant we are "let go" from outward objects and claims, to return joyfully "to our company," our Blessed Lord himself. Into the purer, higher atmosphere, all who have accepted Jesus as their Savior might be lifted up, simply by looking unto him with the same look of hope and trust with which they passed from death unto life. Looking unto Jesus—to be made patient with his patience, active with his activity, loving with his love; asking, not "What can I do," but, "What cannot he?" and waiting upon his strength, which is made perfect in weakness. Looking unto Jesus, in order that the bright rays of his life may be the light of our darkness, that our joys may be holy, and our sorrows calm.—Miss Marsh.

THE HOLY LAND AND ITS AFFAIRS.

MOAB IN HISTORY AND PROPHECY.

Mr. Schick contributes the substance of a lecture delivered by him before the German Society at Jerusalem. The subject is "Moab." Having referred to the conquests of the Israelites east of the Jordan, the writer says:—"That part of the country from the Arnon to the Jabbok, which for a short time had formed an Amorite Kingdom, was not restored to Moab, but became, according to the law of conquest, a part of the Israelitish territory, though, when speaking of this region, Moses, in order to be better understood, calls the highlands 'Sedeh Moab,' and the lowlands 'Arboth Moab.' In the English Bible we read of "the field of Moab" and "the plains of Moab." If for field we understand the "hill country" we shall only just show a due appreciation of the dual division of "the land of Moab" set forth in the two expressions. In the January issue of Hebraica, 1887, Dr. Peters of Philadelphia adduced ample evidence to show that originally the word sadeh meant "mountain" as well as "land."

It likewise appears that the Moabites, at that time, neither advanced claims on their former lands nor dared to do so, though they had still hopes of regaining them, tried to use every opportunity that offered itself for this object, and cherished the thought as a darling wish. Balak, King of Moab, thought of obtaining by subtlety what he evidently could not obtain in any other manner, and he sent to call the celebrated soothsayer, Balaam, from a distance, that he might curse Israel and thereby cause its destruction, but, as is well known, exactly the contrary was effected. On the other hand, the godless advice of Balaam really caused the Israelites great injury. His counsel was to seduce the Israelites to idolatry by means of women. This was repeatedly successful, so that not only did several individuals perish in consequence, but during the time of the Judges even the Moabites were employed by God in order to scourge Israel for such transgressions.

"The Moabites united with the Ammonites and Amalekites as a league against Israel, and subjugated, not only the two-and-a-half trans-Jordanic tribes, but, crossing the river, placed the tribes on this side under bondage, so that the Moabite King Eglon even resided at Jericho till Ehud slew him and saved Israel, Judges iii. 12–31. Later on, the Ammonites, in concert with the children of Moab, made claims on Israel, but by a brilliant victory, Jephthah swiftly decided the dispute, Judges xi. 12–34. Here Moab is certainly not mentioned, but the cities taken by Jephthah were the ancient Moabite ones, and as the King of Ammon demanded the country from the Arnon to the Jabbok (the very district Sihon had taken from Moab) back from Israel, it is clear that he made the claim in the interests of Moab. In spite, however, of Jephthah's victory, the friction between Moab and Israel continued, though in the intervals we meet with records of more friendly intercourse; thus Elimelech of Bethlehem goes to Moab with his family, Ruth i. 1; and Ruth, a Moabite, goes with her mother-in-law to Bethlehem, remains there, and becomes the ancestress of King David—though a Moabite was not to enter the Lord's congregation till the tenth generation, Deuteronomy xxiii. 3.

"When the kingdom had regained strength under David, the Moabites and ten other nations made, according to Psalm lxxxiii., a league against Israel, and David prays 'Against Thee (the God of Israel) do they make a covenant,—the tent of Edom and the Ishmaelites; Moab and the Hagarenes; Gebal and Ammon and Amalek; Philistia with the inhabitants of Tyre; Assyria also is joined with them; they have holpen the children of Lot. Make them like the whirling dust,—as stubble before the wind: that they may know that Thou alone, whose name is Jehovah, art the Most High over all the earth.' This prayer of David was heard; he humbled all these nations, so that they became subject to the Kingdom of Israel, and we read that of the Moabites two-thirds were killed and one-third was permitted to live. Moab was very much, and for a long time, weakened by this, and it makes it all the more remarkable that the wise Solomon was so foolish as to keep at his court Moabitish women who inclined his heart to idolatry, so that, on a height over against the temple of the God of Israel, he erected a place of sacrifice to Chemosh the God of the Moabites. Here again the counsel of Balaam had been acted upon, and with the same destructive consequences. Hereby the germ of the later division of the monarchy was laid. In the course of a century Moab had so recovered that in the districts beyond Jordan aggressive wars could be successfully undertaken against Israel, so that Mesha was able to settle firmly at Dibon.

It was at Dibon that the well-known Moabite Stone was found in the year 1868. Thereon Mesha records how he secured independence. In the Second Book of Kings we have information of the commencement of the rebellion; on the Stone we have a history of its successful conclusion.

"Various Bedouin tribes now live in Moab. According to prophecy there is yet a future in store for Moab, for the numerous threats and announcements of punishment in Isaiah xvi., and Jeremiah xlviii., and (v. 47) with the words, 'Yet will I bring again the captivity of Moab in the latter days, saith the Lord.'"

Dr. W. Fakenham Walsh, in his handbook on the Moabite Stone, writes: "Amidst the scathing woes that were denounced on Moab by prophetic lips, there fell one short but pregnant promise of future glory and restoration —'Yet will I bring again' etc. That promise shall be fulfilled, as surely completely as any of the denunciations which accompany it. How or when it shall be accomplished, we cannot tell; but, in God's own time, Moab shall rise again, to be, perhaps, the partner of Jerusalem in its future glory, and to be reckoned, not as of old amongst the enemies, but amongst the friends (as well as the kindred) of the seed of Abraham."

THE SANITARY CONDITION OF JERUSALEM.

Dr. A Berliner makes a contribution to a history of Hebrew printing in Syria from the sixteenth to the present century; and Dr. Schwarz, medical officer of Baron Rothschild's Hospital, writes on the sanitary condition of Jerusalem during the year 1886. He enlarges upon the filthy habits of Jewish immigrants from Europe, and points out that though some doctors send persons suffering from lung diseases to reside in Jerusalem, the climate is actually one that predisposes to rheumatism and chest affections. He condemns the conditions under which boys are educated in Talmudical lore, and exposes the custom of early marriages, saying that a fourteen-year-old mother is not at all an extraordinary thing in Jerusalem. Health statistics and particulars of the commerce of the port of Jaffa close the English portion of the "Year-book."

RECENT DISCOVERIES IN JERUSALEM.

"Recent Discoveries in Jerusalem" is the title of a second article by Dr. Merrill. An account of the recovery of the second wall, described by Josephus as encircling the northern quarter of the city, is followed by particulars of the opening in the year 1886 of some tombs near the Damascus Gate. The tombs appear to be Christian and not Jewish; a few hundred yards to the north of them, an ancient church has been unearthed, and about half-way between the church and the tombs a beautiful mosaic floor, of considerable extent. The writer says: "Those who are interested in such matters will be surprised when told that the accumulations of earth and rubbish above these various ruins was ten feet and from that upwards. The tombs were ten feet under the surface. The mosaic floor was fifteen feet, and parts of the old church as many as twenty feet below it. How old ruins get covered to such a depth is a constant surprise even to one who has studied them for years. This peculiarity was well illustrated in 1885 when an attempt was made to grade the streets for a few hundred yards in front of the Castle and the Mediterranean Hotel in this city. At a depth of four to eight feet the tops of six or more ancient houses were reached, also a number of old cisterns, old walls, and large squared stones, the existence of which was not known. The old houses were filled in by the workmen where this had not been done before, and likewise the cisterns. The substantial wall of a building in which there were places for doors and windows, was utilized as one side of a sewer, the great blocks of stone were broken up, and thus, after the paving stones had been laid, all traces of these antiquities were obliterated! Wherever one digs inside the walls of Jerusalem he is sure to find old remains, and this is true to a great extent of the region outside the wall in their immediate vicinity."

ANOTHER PICTURE—PALESTINE AS IT IS TO BE.

The Hebrew pages of the "Year-book" are filled with matter of limited interest, the subjects including items of archæology, contributions to the history of the Jews in the Middle Ages, Rabbinical expositions, and a review of Palestine affairs during the past few years. It is gratifying to learn from the pages of such a book what is the actual state of things in the Holy Land, the information is at once a commentary upon the past, and, in view of the promises of God, an augury of better days in store. Palestine as it is, the land of desolation, cannot be regarded as an attractive picture in the highest sense; Palestine as it is to be, the land of gladness, is a picture attractive beyond conception. By the word of prophecy alone can the future blessedness be described, and here is a bird's-eye view of the city of the Great King, and the Land of Promise:—"Comforted hath comforted Zion; he hath comforted all her waste places, and hath made her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord; joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody. Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem, for the Lord hath comforted his people. He hath redeemed Jerusalem. And they shall build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations. At that time they shall call Jerusalem the Throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem: neither shall they walk any more after the stubbornness of their evil heart," Isaiah ii. 4; iii. 9; lxi. 4; Jeremiah iii. 17—Revised Version. The "time appointed" will come. In the meantime, let God be praised for his gracious promises, and for giving us a knowledge of his purposes of love.—James William Thirtle, in Messenger.

Regulation of Liquor Traffic.

Journals conducted in the interests of the rum-sellers deny the right of any one to interfere with a man who wishes to buy and to drink any beverage that he desires. This sounds like a defense of personal liberty, but it is mere nonsense.

1. No man has any right to carry on a business which produces results for which other men must pay heavily. The taxes of every citizen are more than doubled by the evils which flow directly from the rum traffic. The rumsellers pay for and the mass of tax-payers pay millions of dollars every year that they may have the privilege of doing so.

2. No man has any right to carry on a business which corrupts the morals of other men. Nine-tenths of the crime in this country springs directly from the rum traffic. It corrupts the young, debauches the old, destroys families, cripples workmen, makes politics vicious, defies the Sunday laws, wastes the people's substance, injures trade, and produces pauperism, theft, murder, and insanity. If society has no right to meddle with such a monstrous public nuisance as this, then it has not the ordinary right of self-preservation.—Textile Record.

THE war cloud hangs as heavily over Europe as ever. Before old discords are settled new and irritating vexations arise to render the situation more and more complicated.

IT was with the feeling of profound grief that we learned from the International Standard for April, that its Editor, Mr. Charles Latimer, died March 25, 1888, at his home in Cleveland, Ohio. He was stricken with apoplexy while apparently in perfect health. While on his knees at morning family prayer the summons came. We were hoping that he would be spared to conduct an expedition to explore the monuments in the valley of the Nile. In the furtherance of Egyptian investigations science has met with a great loss in Mr. Latimer's death.

PERPETUATED IDOLATRY.

The poisonous streams of idolatry all proceed from the spring-head, Old Pagan Babylon is the source of the rivers of death. Mr. G. H. Pember, in a lecture printed a few weeks ago in the Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times, shows that the world's idolatry in a single system in transformations among different nations, and that it is as old as history. Speaking of the Harlot system so widely spread even among Protestant nations, he says: "The harlot is represented as "the mother of harlots and the abominations of the earth." Some suppose her to be Popery, but while Popery is included, this goes farther, for the harlot is the great source of wickedness from the earliest times. Therefore we must search for some system from which all others have sprung. There is one such, and it is the Babylonian, the great feature of which is a Trinity in imitation of the blessed Holy Trinity. But the Pagan Trinity is Father, Mother, and Son, which may be traced in all Pagan systems. This idolatry commenced with the worship of the sun-god, doubtless Satan himself.

It is remarkable that the very name of Satan passes through its Chaldean form "Bheltan," into the Greek "Titan," the sun-god. And this Babylonish form of idolatry betrays itself in Theosophy and Romanism by the feminine element in the Trinity, Father, Mother, and Child; but the Father soon passes out of notice, and everywhere is seen Woman and Child; Moon goddess and Sun-god. Now you may have been astonished at some of the vestments in so-called Protestant churches. Whence do they come? Not from the Bible; not from any Jewish scenes. Whence then? Go to the museums and study the sculptured slabs, and signets, and clay tablets; there you will discover the source. These robes are Babylonish. When you understand this, then, if you see such in any church, you know whose service is going on. Again, if you see a tonsured priest, you recognize him as attached to the sun, and as a rebel against God, for God has commanded his priests not to make bald the head. The head of a picture or image surrounded with a circular halo reveals to you one of the minor deities or saints invested with some attribute of the sun. The round wafer administered to the communicant is recognized as the sacrament of Mithras. Nor do you fail to notice how it breaks the Christian symbolism, which demands that all the bread distributed be parted from one loaf.

The turning of worshipers towards the East reminds you of the universal practice of Heathendom; and you remember that the Creator commanded his holy of holies to be set toward the West, in order to distinguish between his worshipers and those of the Sun and Satan. Nor do you forget the incident of Ezek. viii. 15, 16, where the greatest of all the abomination of Jerusalem is exemplified in the twenty-five men, between the porch and the altar, with their backs towards the temple of the Lord and their faces towards the East, worshiping the Sun. Wherever you see these things, there is the finger of the harlot; the influence of Babylon, of Babylon in mystery it may be, but unmistakably of Babylon. The harlot, then, is the organizer of this secret sect, the chief propagator of false religion. Her system of evil rose in Babylon, and eventually found its seat in Rome."

For a complete and most startling expose of the idolatries and abominations of Romanism procure and read Chiniquy's book, of which we have previously spoken. Among many other startling revelations the reader will learn how the assassination of President Lincoln was brought about. The deadly viper is now aiming to strike its venomed fangs into the very vitals of the American Republic. Keep your sons and daughters from the pernicious influence of the heaven-doomed system. After Protestants once read Chiniquy's Book they will keep their children from all the influence of Papal Rome. May God watch over and preserve our country and its liberties till Jesus comes and rids the earth of all such abominations.

PAPAL BENEDICTIONS. No. 2.

Prussia, victorious and progressive, still stood in the way of the schemes of the Papacy. The Jesuits appealed to Louis Napoleon. Eugenie helped them in their suit. The Pope's benediction upon the arms of France was promised. Taking offence at a mere trifle, the Emperor of France declared war against Prussia on the 15th of July, 1870. The day before, the Vatican Council had decreed the infallibility of the Pope. One would think he would need some council to bolster him up a little after all those blunders. Then in spite of the lessons to be learned from Jeff. Davis and Maximilian, in spite of the lesson of the Austro-Prussian war and the repeal of the Concordat, a council of men claiming to be sensible and in their right minds, did on the 18th of July, 1870, in the city of Rome, proclaim the silly dogma of Papal infallibility, and millions of deluded people accepted it. The council hurled that decree in the face of the nineteenth century, and the nineteenth century, bearing on its bosom the Bible of God, swept on in its ever-brightening way.

The Jesuits with kindling eyes saw the legions of France marching out of Paris the very next day after that decree of infallibility. "A bas Berlin!" was the war-cry. Napoleon with his son by his side bade Eugenie a gay good-by, no doubt expecting when he came back he would bring old King William and Bismarck home to Paris as prisoners of war. The battle of Sedan occurred Sept. 1. Napoleon surrendered to Von Moltke with 183,000 men. When did you ever hear of 183,000 Protestants surrendering to any power on earth with arms in their hands? As the metaphysicians say, "It is unthinkable."

On the 5th of October, King William and Bismarck made their headquarters at Versailles, where are the magnificent palaces of the Bourbon kings. They were there not as prisoners, but as conquerors. On December 10 the German Empire was proclaimed, and William, king of Prussia was elected emperor of Germany. Little did that proud monarch, Charles V. dream of such an event when he looked into the face of the monk of Erfurt at the Diet of Worms and heard him say, "Here I stand. I can do no other, God help me!" The German Empire came from the Reformation. Luther built it. There it stood, a man on whose head the Papal maledictions which were hurled against him turned to blessings for himself and for his country.

Paris surrendered to Emperor William, January 28, 1871; so that it only took the German army two weeks to break the military power of France and overturn the throne of Napoleon; and it only required six months and nine days to march leisurely from Sedan to Paris and receive the surrender of the city. Quick work that! Was there ever anything like it in human history? It is part of the retribution which is visited upon the Roman Catholic Church for her bigotry and intolerance, that the nations which accept her yoke lose the manly qualities necessary to produce good soldiers. The only nations which have attained to real greatness are those which have thrown off that yoke, or which have refused to put it on. This is in fulfilment of the decree of the Almighty: "I will destroy the strength of the heathen nations." Mariolatry is as subversive of all truly spiritual life as idolatry, and the history of Catholic nations shows that they come sooner or later, without exception, to illustrate the impossibility of escaping the destiny prophesied in this decree.

Macaulay, England's greatest historian, has some strong words upon this subject. He says:—

"During the last three centuries, to stunt the growth of the human mind has been the chief object of the Church of Rome. Throughout Christendom, whatever advance has been made in knowledge, in freedom, in wealth, and in the arts of life, has been made in spite of her, and has everywhere been in inverse proportion to her power. The loveliest and most fertile provinces of Europe have under her rule, been sunk in poverty and political servitude and intellectual torpor, while Protestant countries, once provincial for sterility and barbarism, have been turned by skill and industry into gardens, and can boast of a long list of heroes and statesmen, philosophers and poets. Whoever, knowing what Scotland and Italy naturally are, and what four hundred years ago they actually were, shall now compare the country around Rome and the country around Edinburg, will be able to form some judgment as to the tendency of Papal domination. The descent of Spain, once the first among monarchies, to the lowest depths of degradation, the elevation of Holland, in spite of many natural disadvantages, to a position such as no commonwealth so small has ever reached, teach the same lesson. Whoever passes in Germany from a Roman Catholic to a Protestant principality, in Switzerland from a Roman Catholic to a Protestant canton, in Ireland from a Roman Catholic to a Protestant county, finds that he has passed from a lower to a higher grade of civilization. The Protestants of the United States have left far behind them the Roman Catholics of Mexico, Peru and Brazil. The Roman Catholics of Lower Canada remain inert, while the whole continent around them is in a ferment with Protestant activity and enterprise."

Nations fulfill the prophecies of the Bible and the decree of the Almighty without knowing it. Statesmen attribute to this cause and that the fate of battles and the results of great conflicts. They will tell of the difference in the arms, or of the drill, but the difference is to the men who handle the arms, and who have gone through the drill. The history of the world shows that bigotry, superstition and cowardice are inseparably linked together. This is the retribution of God upon the nations that accept the yoke of this apostate church.

Napoleon III did not know this. From Sedan he went as a prisoner of war to Chiselhurst, and there he died, broken-hearted, crownless, and throneless—a victim of the Papal benediction which fell upon his head and upon his fortunes a withering curse.

But now another scene in this tremendous drama. Napoleon needed all his troops. His bayonets had preserved the temporal power of the Pope for years. The last detachment of them was withdrawn August 8, 1870, and on the 20th of the following month Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel entered Rome. On the 2d of October the Pontifical States were absorbed into the Kingdom of Italy, and Rome became the capital of a united people. The Papal maledictions were hurled at these great leaders, but they fell in blessings on their heads. Heaven failed to ratify both maledictions and benedictions.

Plain as these lessons seem to a Protestant mind, they are far from being accepted by Roman Catholics. Monsignor Preston, of New York, said recently in a sermon:

"Leo XIII, like Pius IX, is held a prisoner by the hostile bayonets of his ungrateful children, but he is stronger and more powerful today than ever before. The infallibility of the Pope is unquestioned. He can not teach false doctrine. He cannot err. Every word Leo speaks from his high chair is the voice of the Holy Ghost, and must be obeyed. To every Catholic heart comes no thought but obedience.

"You must not think as you choose. You must think as Catholics. The man who says, 'I will take my faith from Peter, but I will not take my politics from Peter,' is not a true Catholic. The church teaches that the Supreme Pontiff must be obeyed, because he is the vicar of the Lord. Christ speaks through him.

"Leo XIII is not only the prince of princes, but the king of kings. He is not only a spiritual ruler, but a temporal ruler. In tones as strong as those of Pius IX, Pope Leo has said, 'I will never yield; I will never give up my temporal principality.' And God, in his own time, will bring it back to him. Whether Leo XIII receives his temporal principality soon or not, we know that some day it will come back to him."

The editor of the Western Watchman, a Catholic paper published at St. Louis, used the following language in an editorial:

"Protestantism—We would draw and quarter it. We would empale and hang it up for crow's meat. We would tear it with pinchers and fire it with hot irons. We would fill it with molten lead and sink in it a hundred fathoms of hell fire."

Catholics have done all these things to Protestants many times. Listen now to the utterances of Cardinal Manning of England. Addressing the Third Provincial Council of the Archdiocese of Westminster, he said:

"It is yours, Right Reverend Fathers, to subjugate and subdue, to bend and to break, the will of an imperial race—the will, which as of Rome of old, rules over nations and peoples invincible and inflexible. You have a great commission to fulfil, and great is the prize for which you strive. Surely, a soldier's eye and a soldier's heart would choose by intuition this field of England for the warfare of the faith. None simpler or nobler could be found. It is the head of Protestantism, the centre of its movements, and the stronghold of its power. Weakened in England, it is paralyzed everywhere. Conquered in England, it is conquered throughout the world. Overthrown here, all is but a war of detail. All the roots of the whole world meet in one point. England is the key of the whole position of modern error."

And to assure the complete success of this infernal conspiracy against the happiness and progress of mankind, Ireland is to be secured as the rendezvous of England's foes, and in some supreme hour of her struggle with some continental power, the Pope will absolve all Catholics in the British Empire from their oath of allegiance to their government, and while fighting for her very existence she will have to deal with millions of enemies in her own household. Stripped of its Gladstonian glamor, this is the Home Rule scheme. The Jesuits and the devil are at the bottom of it, and the Pope has given it his benediction. Wm. E. Gladstone is the James Buchanan of England. Never did two rulers so nearly resemble each other.

If U. S. Grant had been Premier of England, Gordon would not have been left to perish at Khartoum. The friendly tribes of the Soudan would not have been driven all Jews who are not residents of Jerusalem to remain longer than thirty days in the city, but the all-powerful "bakshish" enables them to live here as long as they wish without molestation. They are still coming in great numbers. Wealthy Jews have built hospitals and founded homes for them in and about the city, and as many of these who come are poor, they live from the charity of their brethren.

This increase in Jewish population has also largely increased the company which goes on Friday afternoon to the wailing-place. At three o'clock the place was already full, and for two hours the narrow streets leading to the place were crowded with Jews, either going to or returning from the place. Their number amounted to several hundred. It was indeed an affecting sight. They stood against the wall, often three or four deep. Those in front embraced the stones, and kissed them, while those behind reached over the shoulders of the others in order to touch the wall, all the time praying or reading from their books, and many of them weeping and sobbing in a most pitiable manner.

There are now two Christian missions to the Jews here. The work is making some progress, but is indeed slow. The London Society mission has often a congregation of fifty Jews. The Home for Jewish Orphans brings up many in the Christian faith. Mr. Joseph, a converted Jew, has also an independent mission. His congregation varies from five to thirty. He has been here only a short time, but his earnest and persistent efforts give promise of success.

The various missions to the Moslems here have many in attendance, so long as money is freely distributed. They are willing to come so long as they are paid for it. But the genuine progress of the missions seems to be small.

The Greek church is by far the most numerous of all. The Russian Government has done a great deal to encourage the numerous pilgrims by building large houses for their accommodation. A new and beautiful Russian quarter is being built just outside the Jaffa gate. They now have accommodations for about four thousand pilgrims. Great numbers of them are here now. They are led about in droves to visit the holy places. They kiss the stones of the walls, floors, tombs—everything in fact; and are continually prostrating or crossing themselves. They are mostly Russian peasants, and a sorrier looking lot could scarcely be gotten together. They are clothed, too, in the peasant's dress, and men and women wear immense top boots, which they generally remove before going into the Holy Sepulchre. The stone pillar in this church, which is said to mark the centre of the earth, is an object of special veneration to these pilgrims. It is continually surrounded by a crowd of them, who kneel about it and embrace and kiss it.

The Greeks have many monasteries here and in the neighborhood. One of the most interesting and picturesque of them is Mar Saba, situated on the continuation of the brook Kedron, about three hours' ride from the city. The sides of the valley rise in cliffs and terraces to a height of 800 feet, and are full of caves which formerly served the monks as cells. The place has been inhabited by monks for about 1,500 years.

The cloister clings to the side of the valley and is built on terraces and jutting rocks, wherever a few feet of ground could be reached. The buildings are held in position by immense half arches and supporting walls. It is a rich cloister and has consequently often been sacked. In 614 Chosroes II, King of Persia, burned it and killed the monks. The skulls of three of them are now exposed for the pious pilgrims to kiss. In consequence of the dangers from the Arabs it is surrounded by a high wall which gives it the appearance of a fort. Fifty-five monks are now here. They live very simple, and their rules are very strict. They rise at one o'clock in the night and spend five hours together in prayer. Each one has manual labor to perform during the day. I found the Abbot, or head monk, at work in his garden, carefully removing the weeds from among the vegetables. I accosted him in Greek and he bade me a hearty welcome, in words at least, though he scarcely looked up, and went on with his work.

In this lonely place they are far removed from all the noise and bustle of the world. However, some of them who were Bulgarians were interested in the Bulgarian question, and wanted to know what was going on in Sofia. Two of them asked about the size of the earth, the moon and the sun, and how far away from each other they are. Some one had told them that there are fish in the ocean larger than the mountains about their cloister, and their credulity was greatly taxed by it. They were very glad when I told them that it was not true. It was strange to hear men fifty years of age asking questions which even children are expected to know.

The cloister once possessed some fine manuscripts, but the Patriarch of Jerusalem has brought all the libraries of the monasteries together at Jerusalem. I visited him and asked permission to see the library, which was gladly given. He has called a very efficient epigraphist, Mr. Papadopulos-Keramous, from Constantinople, who is now making a descriptive catalogue of the library. There are about 1,500 manuscripts in the library, some of them containing writings entirely unknown. Only about half of them have been examined. He will soon publish a preliminary report of his work, and the catalogue will appear in about a year. The Patriarch will also publish some of the most interesting and important manuscripts. He showed me some beautifully illuminated manuscripts ranging from the eighth to the fifteenth century.

A walk around the walls of Jerusalem by the bright moonlight makes a deeper and more agreeable impression than the same trip by day. The filth is not so apparent and the crowds of dirty Moslems are not in the way, and for once you hear no cry for "bakshish!" Mount Zion, with its tomb of David, seems grander. The garden of Gethsemane and the Mount of Olives lie peacefully in the bright moonlight, and the quiet of the place is very inviting. The gates so crowded by day are empty. Golgotha is deserted, and here alone in the moonlight, one easily pictures to himself the scene of agony and death where Christ suffered for us. At this lonely hour and place his mercy and the love seem greater, his humiliation deeper, and his glory which we hope to see, more radiant than ever before.—C. J. Thatcher, in New York Observer.

To Those of Like Precious Faith.

I left home March 30, and went to fill an appointment at the Roose School house, six miles from Bremen. Commenced Saturday night March 31, continued over two Sundays. Had a good meeting. Brother Geiselman was with me a part of the time, and helped in the preaching of the word. As a result of our efforts three were immersed into the name of Christ for the remission of sins, and then organized with seventeen members. Brother Geiselman is to preach for them as often as he can. They were organized there some years ago, but the former elders moved away; and they became dissatisfied to remain unorganized and concluded to reorganize. May the dear Lord bless them in their efforts to do good in the world. I will try and visit them again some time this season. Love to all the dear ones.

LESSONS FOR EARNEST STUDENTS OF THE BIBLE.—No. 29.

DIVINE HEALING.

GOLDEN TEXT: "Who forgiveth all thy iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases." Psa. 103: 3.

Q. Who, in the gospels, is represented as that Great Physician, or Healer, who heals all diseases?

A. Jesus. Proof: And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people. Matt. 4: 23; 12: 15.

Q. In the work of Jesus, as Redeemer, is the pardon of sin connected with the healing of diseases? In other words, has Christ the power to save from all the guilt of sin and from all its destructive consequences?

A. Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins. Matt. 1: 23. See also Isa. 53: 1–6. Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; yet did we esteem him stricken, smitten of God and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way, the Lord hath laid upon him the iniquity of us all. Comparing this with the New Testament we have, Matt. 8: 16, 17, When the even was come, they brought unto him many that were possessed with devils; and he cast out the spirits with his word, and healed all that were sick; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, saying, himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses. See also Matt. 9: 1–6; Luke 5: 18–32.

Q. In what other important ways is Christ a Savior from the consequences of sin?

A. In both redeeming man from death, the final result of sin, and from him that has the power of death. Heb. 2: 14, 15. Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. See also 1 Cor. 15: 26, 54–57; 1 Jno 11: 25, 26.

Most emphatically then is Christ the Healer of the breach which sin has made in all who come unto God by him. Yea, from the marrow of their bones to the outermost cuticle of their flesh is this healing. And why? Because he was commissioned of high heaven to strike the blow that was destined to kill as dead as a stone the prime mover of this rebellion, even that old serpent the devil and Satan by bruising or crushing his head. Gen. iii. 15: This Christ did by faith when he rose from the dead, and will do it in fact when he comes the second time to judge the world in righteousness. Acts 17: 31; Heb. 2: 14. Now the victory which Christ has gained by faith, he transfers to each one of his children.

As Christ overcame by the faith of God in him, so we overcome by the faith of Christ in us. "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." Gal. 2: 20.

Now is not Christ the healer of the breach which sin has made? has not Satan received from him his death blow? As it is written, "Thou shalt be called the repairer of the breach, the restorer of paths to dwell in." Isa. 58: 12.

Q. In what terms do the Scriptures present the glorious condition of the redeemed when the wounds that sin has made shall all be healed?

A. God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away. Rev. 21: 4; 1 John 3: 1–3; Phil. 3: 21; Col. 3: 4.

PRACTICAL REFLECTIONS ON THE LESSON.

"The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth unto it, and is safe." A safety known only to those who have thus entered into the secret of the Lord; and this secret is for every child of God. Christ is our hope of glory. Not our faith in Christ but the faith of Christ in us to do the work for us, or through us. Herein is the secret of all successful work for God—Christ in us the door of it. Do you want wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption? Christ is of God, made all these unto us. Do you want healing? Take Christ as your healer. In the language of Mr. Simpson, "It is pouring in a flood of life that sweeps disease away, and then remains for all your future need. O, take him in his fulness, take him now." Here are "Beauty," Stability and Health, these three, all to be found in Christ, and Christ in us.

"THOU HAST THE WORDS."
John vi. 68.

To whom shall we go? Thou hast words that can save us,
How then can we trust to the doctrines
of men?
How lean for salvation on arm that would fail us?
What hope in the judgment would be for us then?

To whom shall we go? All in vain to the Father
Would any one seek his own merits to plead,
For thou among'st men art the one Mediator,
All helpless to thee do we come in our need.

To whom shall we go in our pitiless hunger,
Far bread that if eaten one never can die?*
Who gives us his flesh? Thou alone art the manna,
To thee from the dread condemnation we fly.

To whom shall we go for the end of our thirsting?
That ever-cleansing fountain where else
shall we find?
Who lift from our slumbers this weari-
some burden?
Whose blood may we trust, O our Savior
but thine?

To whom shall we go? If we leave thee,
O Master,
None other can give us the weapons for strife,
None other can help in the conquest of evil,
Thou, thou art appointed to give us the life.

Our Bodies a "Scaffolding."

The body has often been compared to a "house," or a temporary dwelling place; but Dr. Talmage has changed the figure somewhat in a sermon delivered lately on "Wifely Ambition." The following is a quotation from the sermon. "You, having had a sanctified and divinely ennobled wifely ambition, will pass up into the palaces, and what becomes of your body is of no importance, for it is only a scaffolding, pulled down now that your temple is done. You will stand in the everlasting rest, and see your husband come in, and see your children come in, if they have not preceded you. Glorified Christian wife! Pick up any crown you wish from off the King's footstool, and wear it, it was promised you long ago, and with it cover up all the scars of your earthly conflict."

According to these statements, and being uttered by a Doctor of Divinity, they ought to be true, the wife who has the right kind of ambition, passes into the palaces above when the body called the "scaffolding" is pulled down; and in those beautiful eternal dwelling places, will see her husband and her children come in if they have not preceded her. In that case I suppose they will see her come in. She can pick up any crown she pleases and put it on her head. I see no reason why the husband and children can not have the privilege of doing the same, for they can not get there unless they have the sanctified, divinely ennobled, "ambition."

Then the whole family will be in "palaces," and crowned according to their several tastes. That is they will all be kings and queens. That appears to be according to the Scriptures. But over whom are these crowned families to reign? The other part of the great family of man, according to this Doctor's divinity, or theology, go to another place, and of course these sanctified ones do not reign over them. What then? Is this wearing crowns a sort of play that they are to be always engaged in? That might do for children, but scarcely satisfactory to minds who have had a noble "ambition" and have been engaged in honorable labor and conflict here. But it appears that the body is to have no part in the "everlasting rest." The spirit is to stand there crowned without the body. The body is only the "scaffolding," pulled down when the temple is done. What the "temple" is we are not informed, but as the spirit goes up into a palace, the palace must be the temple. But who builds the palace? Certainly not the spirit. According to the Scriptures the builder of the eternal dwelling place is God. Does God use the body as a scaffolding in building the heavenly house? The Bible contains no such teaching. Then what about the bodies of the unsanctified? As there are no temples prepared for them their bodies cannot be scaffolding. Then what are they? The Doctor does not say. When an infant's body, the scaffolding, is pulled down, is the temple done?

If the body is but a scaffolding, does the spirit exist without a body when the scaffolding is pulled down? If so how can it wear a crown? How will the wife spirit know the husband spirit having never seen it before. Do spirits see without eyes, and hear without ears, and wear crowns without heads? Of what use are "palaces" to bodiless entities?

If the body is a scaffolding it was designed from the beginning so to be. Then why does the sacred record say "The Lord God formed man out of the dust of the ground?" etc. It should have read, He formed a scaffold out of the dust of the ground, and put a spirit man in it or on it. And why did God cause man to die because his scaffolding ate of the forbidden tree? The falling down of a scaffolding is not dying, and, of course, a spirit man could not be crushed by the fall. And why was the body of the second man the Lord from heaven, raised from among the dead, if it was but a scaffolding pulled down on the cross when his temple was "finished?"

Now it is very plain that if the body is a scaffolding, it is of no importance what becomes of it when it is pulled down upon the completion of the temple, for having answered the purpose for which it was reared up, it is not the design of the builder to rear it again. Consequently there is no resurrection of the dead. A fallen scaffold is not a dead person. The person according to the Doctor goes up into the prepared temple, and therefore does not die. As therefore, according to the Doctor, "there are no dead," it is absurd to affirm "the resurrection of the dead." And if the dead rise not, says Paul, "then Christ has not been raised: and if Christ has not been raised," our "preaching is vain," our "faith is vain," we "are yet in our sins," Doctor Talmage and all; then they that have fallen asleep in Christ have perished, scaffolding and all, and the whole superstructure has gone to ruin. Thus as comparing this doctor's theology with the gospel preached by the apostles of Jesus Christ, we find that it is in direct opposition to the gospel, and as that gospel is the sum and substance of "the law and of the testimony," we must come to the conclusion that there is no "light" in the Doctor on this subject, notwithstanding the apparent beauty of his language. His "scaffolding" is a mere castle in the air which vanishes away when we come to examine the foundation upon which it is reared up. To the law and testimony then we will cling, and build our hope of life on the foundation of the promises of Israel's God confirmed by the resurrection of his Son, our Redeemer, and Israel's Messiah.

My Seventh Day Sabbath Experience.

Elder Benjamin Woodward, of Dutton, Mich., made me a visit lately, and while at my house I gave him some of my experience touching this subject, and he found it so interesting that he thought it would do good to have me write it out and send it to THE RESTITUTION to be published, and so by his solicitation I will do so.

In my early experience in coming to Michigan to labor in the cause of our soon-coming Lord, I or we was the means of leading Elder M. E. Cornell into the faith of the Savior's coming, and soon he commenced preaching what is called the Advent doctrine, but unfortunately he fell into the ranks of Sabbath keepers, and they nosed him up and put a new song into his mouth, and puffed him through the Review and Herald, so that he became quite a noted man in their ranks. And while I was holding a protracted meeting some three miles from the village of Moscow, where I had a regular appointment once in two weeks, he came and secured the M. E. Church to hold some meetings, then came down to see me and through his urgent solicitation I gave up my appointment and went to hear him. When we got to the church, before we went in, he took me aside and said to me, I am going to preach on the Sabbath question today and I do not want you to oppose me. Well, said I, go ahead, do your best, for I want to see the best you have got. After the meeting was out, I invited Elders Cornell and Curry, another Advent minister who had endorsed the truth through our labor, to go with me to my evening appointment, some six miles away. I invited Brother Curry to fill my appointment in the evening and he had turned up a seventh day man. After this meeting was over I invited Elder Cornell to go home with me. So I took him into my carriage and drove home with him, some twenty-five miles, and took him into my house where he stayed eight days. I announced an appointment for him to lay sabbatarianism, and he preached eight discourses, but none of them on the Sabbath question I then called for a collection and raised $8.00. Then I took him to Hillsdale, eight miles, where he took the cars for Battle Creek.

Before we parted he urged me hard to attend their Conference at Jackson, Mich. He was exceedingly solicitous, and would not take no for an answer. He said all their leading ministers would be present, and I finally told him that if I could arrange my business at home I would do so, thinking if I had come to a wrong conclusion on the subject I should get my eyes open by listening to their most able advocates. So I went to that conference. Elder M. Curry (the brother mentioned above) made some remarks as follows to the company already assembled. Said he, "Brother Seymour will not come to this meeting unless he comes a converted man." M. E. Cornell said, "Yes he will; he will come to test this matter." And soon I rapped at the door. When the door was opened and they saw who it was that knocked, all expressed great satisfaction and joy on seeing me there at D. Palmer's to attend their conference. I was acquainted with nearly all at this meeting. Brother Curry said to me after taking my seat. "Brother Seymour, I consider you my spiritual father; you have led me into a good many good things and now I think I have got a little the start of you on the Sabbath question, and now I want to lead you into that;" said he, "you have come to embrace the Sabbath, have you not?" Yes, said I, if you have the truth on that question I want it, but in answer, I said, I want you to definitely understand that your love nor your sympathy, nor your money (for money had been held out to me twice as an inducement to lead me to the Sabbath); no, said I, nor Mrs. White's visions will have any tendency to lead me in. No, said I, nothing but a "thus saith the Lord" will ever lead me. If you have that I shall be with you with all my heart. So they did not put forth any effort to convert me but by presenting testimony drawn from the Bible.

So on their Sabbath Elder D. P. Hall took the stand and preached one hour on the Law; then J. M. Stephenson arose and spoke another hour; when he was through, James White arose and spoke another hour; three hours in one meeting without any intermission for my special benefit, for I was the only unbeliever in the congregation. I listened with critical attention but could see a place for almost everything that was presented during this three hours of tiresome mental labor. Their Sabbath night I was with Elders Curry, Cornell, James White and wife, and others invited to stay over night with Cyrenus Smith's family, former friends in deed and in truth. That night I slept with Brother Curry. As soon as day had dawned Brother Cornell came up stairs into the bedroom. "Well," said he, "Brother Seymour, how does the Sabbath look to you this morning?" Oh, said I, Brother Cornell it looks glorious. I never saw it so clear in my life. As he did not comprehend my saying fully well, said he, "How do you view it?" Well, said I, Brother Cornell; I never was more satisfied in my life than I am now that you are wrong on the Sabbath question. He dropped his head and retraced his steps, and reported to the company my convictions. They discovered that their three hours' labor was a sad failure. They did not catch their desirable bird. They thought if they could secure me in their Sabbath net they would sweep all the Adventists in Michigan in with Brother and Sister Seymour, as we were about the first ones who came to Michigan to labor and had raised up some friends and some preachers to stand by the cause we loved so well.

When they discovered that they had failed to catch their longed-for game, they then began to try to destroy my influence. So J. H. Wagoner published me through the Battle Creek paper as a wolf in sheep's clothing, and some two years since they sent with another message about me and stated that I was the most crafty and bitter opponent they had in the United States. Quite notorious. I was not aware till of late that I occupied so exalted a place in the United States. But that announcement has not in the least hurt me, for since they puffed me so highly my pamphlet has been called for in almost every State in the union. And even now and then, every little while, some get troubled on that question and write to me on the subject and call for my work on that subject. I sincerely thank my seventh day fraternity for giving me such a noble commendation. And this same class has given D. M. Canright a very rich commendation from the pen of George I. Butler, J. H. Wagoner and Uriah Smith (Editor of the Battle Creek paper) in an extra paper containing fifty-nine columns. So three of their able ministers do what they can to lower his influence, but instead of that they exalt him before all the religious world as well as political, but nevertheless all candid and intelligent and worthy people are going to see fair play and will give him a hearing. I know the man and believing him to be a strictly honest Christian man, worthy of full confidence, I bespeak for him a candid and critical hearing. Let the dogs bark, they cannot hurt him. He is a power in the Christian world on the question at issue. The very best posted man they ever have had, Brother Canright, has got around to the place where I arrived twenty-five years ago, and I bid him God speed, for he is now hard at work undoing what he has been doing for twenty-eight years. He has been thrown under the most destructive influences of these last days; they have befogged, befooled, bewitched and bedeviled him for a long time, but by the sunlight of truth and righteousness the seventh day scales have been gently sliding off till now the shackles that have so long bound him are entirely dropped off, and now he is a freeman in Christ Jesus, and doing much good. He is now getting out a book on the Sabbath question, and I hope all will secure a copy when it is ready for sale.

TEACH US HOW TO PRAY.

"I will not say old Lay me down,
I want a new sweet prayer,"
Oh, little child with eyes so brown,
And face, to me, so fair,
Those simple lines, sacred to me,
Were taught me at a mother's knee.

But to repeat them over and o'er,
Words meaningless to you,
As if your only "stock and store"
You ask for something new,
And some of us, much older grown,
The self-same wish have often known.

How much vain and hypocrisy
Might sooner have an end,
If we would teach our knees to see
The risen Christ a friend.
If we could learn with truth to say,
Oh, Father, teach us how to pray.

MARTHA HAMMAN.

Dear Little Workers:

How often I have thought of you all since visiting you both at Plymouth and Rensselaer, and I have thought how thankful you ought all to be for Sisters Chaplin and Dwiggins who have taken so much interest in your future eternal welfare as to spend their time and thought in helping you to begin while still in youth to form habits that will make good, honest men and women of you. Do you remember, dear children, of one in olden times who gave her son to the Lord while he was still a babe, and as he grew from babyhood to boyhood, how he fulfilled his duties in the house of the Lord, and though they were only to put out the sacred candle-stick and open the doors at sunrise, it was done for God; and there in that sacred place he learned the lessons of truth, consecration and devotion which followed him all his life, and he was loved of the good Father. So you, dear little lambs of the heavenly fold, will, if your hearts are right, learn in these little meetings of yours to be true followers of the little babe who was born to redeem you from all sin. No matter how small the duties you are asked to perform, if you do them well, working for the good of Christ's cause, you will all be rewarded in the time when Christ comes to reward all his faithful ones. May you all, like Samuel of old, follow God in youth and be ready for the coming king, is the wish of your brother in Christ.

THE STORY OF ISAAC LEVINSOHN.

When the Feast of the New Year was over, I purchased a ticket for Hull, leaving Hamburg on Tuesday, September 10, 1871.

On reaching England I found myself in a strange land, and amongst people whose language was entirely foreign to me. It was the eve of the Sabbath when the boat arrived there, and I walked about the shore, not knowing what to do, for I could neither speak nor write English. At length I went into the streets, and coming to a bookseller's shop, began to speak to the people in German. Finding this of no use I tried Hebrew, then Russian, and then Polish, but yet a word did they understand. So I thought I would make myself understood by writing, and said several times, "Gib mir ein pen." The people in the shop thought I begged, and they offered me a penny. So I showed them a shilling, and wrote with my finger upon the counter. They then guessed my meaning, and brought me a pen and ink. They did not understand the German words I wrote, but one of them fetched a gentleman who understood German, and he kindly interpreted for me. I desired to buy an English-German and German-English dictionary, to carry about with me, so that if I had anything to say I might find out the words, write them down on paper, and then by showing what I had written manage to make myself understood.

My first want was to know where the Jews lived, for I was anxious to rest on the Sabbath day according to the Law. So by the help of the dictionary I made my question known to a young man in the shop, who very kindly took me to the house of a Polish Jew, and he welcomed me, seeing I was a stranger. Very pleasant it was to be addressed according to the manner of the Jews in Russia, Poland, and Palestine, with "Shalom alachem"—Peace be unto you!

I asked him where I could obtain lodgings, and he allowed me to remain with him. In the evening he led me to the synagogue where the Sabbath service was celebrated. The Jewish brother was very pious, and observed every precept of the oral law.

I was very anxious to keep the Great Day of Atonement in London, and obtained permission from the Rabbi at Hull to travel on the afternoon of the Sabbath, in order that I might reach London on the eve of that day; and arrived in the great city on the following morning.

On coming to the London docks, I resorted again to my dictionary, and wrote out a few words, explaining that my desire was to reach a Jews' lodging-house. I showed this paper to a lad, and he took my parcel of clothes and led the way. He walked on for some time along the winding paths of the docks, but whither he was going, of course, I knew not. At length we came to a court, at the corner of which there was, as I afterwards learned, a public house. Beckoning me to wait awhile, the lad went into this building. I waited a long time indeed, but the lad never came out again. Then I began to suspect that I had been robbed of my parcel, and went into the house. I noticed that there were several doors to the house, and was sure the lad got away through one of them with my belongings. I stood in the public house for some time, not knowing what to do, but managed to make myself understood by the aid of the dictionary and paper, and then a young man offered to lead me to a lodging-house in Spitalfields.

How relieved I was on reaching the lodging-house to find myself once more amongst Jews! They rewarded my guide for his trouble, and spoke kindly to me, and, on my informing them of the way in which I had been robbed, they said, "Oh! you must expect this in England." I replied, "Then I shall not stay in England long."

As it was the eve of the Great Day of Atonement, I was anxious to observe all the rites according to the Jewish customs which relate to that holy and solemn season. My first anxiety was to obtain the necessary sacrifice. Having some money, I asked my new friends to prepare a cock to be my atonement. This they did in haste, for it was growing late. Then, according to Jewish custom and law, I offered certain prayers, and presented the bird to the Shochad (a man whose duty it is to slay the sacrifices) for him to kill it on the behalf, and to shed its blood for my sins.

These words are used on the occasion: "This is my substitute; this is my commutation. This cock goeth to death, but may I be gathered, and enter into a long and happy life, and peace!"

As the bird was being killed, and I watched its blood flow, and saw its dying struggles, I felt deeply moved. My sins were the cause of its death, and I wondered deeply in my soul, "How can the blood of this bird cleanse me from my sins?"

Oh! how little did I think that I should ever believe and rejoice in the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, which cleanseth us from all sin. 1 John i. 7.

Here it should be mentioned that, ever since the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the dispersion of the Jews, the Talmud teaches that every male must offer a cock, and every female a hen, in sacrifice for the Great Day of Atonement, these sacrifices being substituted for those commanded by Moses. The reader will remember how the solemn sacrifice for sin, on that great day, are recorded in the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus, when the blood of the sacrifice was carried into the Holiest of all, and how on God's acceptance of the atoning blood for the sins of the people, the High Priest came forth, and so all Israel beheld through him the proof that their sins had been atoned for. But the Jews today have neither Aaron nor Holy Place; instead of the priest they have but the Shochad, and instead of the sacrifice appointed by Moses, they have but those taught by the Talmud. Indeed, one of the most touching parts of the Atonement Service for the synagogue, appended to the description of the former glories of priest, and temple, and service, is this constant refrain, "Happy the eye which saw all these! but verily, to hear only of them afflicts our souls."

After the blood of the bird is shed, the offerer, in devout prayer and thanksgiving, lifts up his heart to God for the atonement wrought for him, taking it as a matter of course that his sins are put away. Then he takes up the sacrifice, which is subsequently eaten by him as a peace-offering, the thought being that his sins are put away by the blood of the victim, so that he can feed upon the sacrifice in peace before God.

The sacrifice being killed, I went to the synagogue, where, washing my hands and taking my shoes from off my feet, I began the appointed prayers. And there I remained for that evening and night, and also for the whole of the following day—the Day of Atonement.

After the services I returned to my lodging, and, as I had been fasting since the previous day, I enjoyed my meal. Yet as I sat over my supper I could not but think of the innocent creature which had been killed for my sins, and was not able to satisfy myself as to how God could require the blood of a poor bird to atone for my iniquity.

I was by no means at peace with God, though I was eating what the Jews observe as a peace offering. I expressed my feelings on this anxious question in a letter to my father, which I lay before the reader:

"I am now in London, with my health perfectly established, for which I thank God with all my heart. I would also inform you, dear father, that I worshiped on the Great Day of Atonement in a synagogue, among our brethren, the English Jews. On the eve I procured a cock, as you always do, to be killed as an atonement for my sins; I could hardly spare the money, but was glad to do so, knowing, as you have always taught me, this is the desire of Jehovah, our God. You will, I hope, truly pardon me for troubling you, but I wish to tell you all that crosses my mind; and in my difficulties I want to tell you only, and then I shall be satisfied. I offered the cock to the shochad, and when it was killed, I was surprised and amazed, for although I have witnessed it at home every year, I never felt more solemnized about my soul than on this occasion, and never felt more deeply about the atonement which is to take away my sin.

"I can hardly imagine, beloved father, why God expects the sacrifice of the creatures, which are killed for me and for others who have sinned.

"Indeed, my dear father, I think that God has not been pleased to manifest unto us all his truth; but I suppose all these difficulties will be made plain to us when the Lord, our Messiah, comes, and takes us unto himself to make us happy forever, and when the Gentile nations of the earth shall perish."

Having one great object on my mind—the study of the law—I visited several Jews, and begged them to teach me the ways of the God of Israel. They granted my request, but the result was very unsatisfactory; yet I blamed my own depraved heart, and laid the failure of the Jews to speak peace to me, to the corruption of my soul.

I was so uneasy and unquiet that I began to ask various persons privately if they were happy in their souls, but the answer was always "No," and this perplexed me very much.

My means were now becoming exhausted, and I was anxious to obtain employment to earn my bread. Just at this time a letter enclosing money, came from my father, and this enabled me to purchase good clothes, and being respectably attired I was successful in obtaining a situation.

How to be Holy.

"But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life." Rom. vi. 22.

There has been a great deal said on the subject of holiness, and many speculations which, I fear, only bewilder some. But I purpose to state only the scriptural basis on which it rests leaving all human theories. Before one can become holy he must be free from sin, as the text proves. Purity can never dwell where sin exists. The Holy Spirit will not occupy that heart which has not been cleansed from all pollutions. It is useless to implore the fullness in Christ until sin has been utterly banished.

Holiness, then, is the fruit of a clean heart. God is ready to bestow his richest blessings on those who are prepared to receive them. The sacred soul then experiences a higher degree of nearness to God. There is a joy in his service, a delight in obedience to his will. Holiness is also progressive. There are heights and depths, lengths and breadths farther on. The end is everlasting life. Who can fathom its import? A life free from every mortal ill, and endless in duration is the greatest gift ever offered to man. And yet how few accept it. How sad to see the multitudes turn away from their only hope and choose death. Such is the terrible effect of sin.

To be holy, one must forsake sin, believe on Jesus, obey his commands, and follow his Spirit. We have the word of God, which very plainly points out the way, so that there is no excuse for ignorance. To all I would say, "Search the Scriptures," which if followed, will make you wise unto salvation. Take Jesus for an example rather than fallible men. Believe his words rather than human speculations and theories. Thus only can we be holy, and maintain a godly walk and character.

"All other ground is sinking sand."

Wide Awake for April greets us with eighty pages overflowing with beautiful pictures, delightful stories and poems. Mrs. Sherwood's serial, "Those Cousins of Mabel's," enforces the usages of good society by the experiences of the heroines. The frontispiece, "Easter Lillies," is a charming illustration; a lovely girl, her arms filled with lillies. Lieut. Fremont's breezy Indian story for boys, a paper on "Old Ballads of London Bridge" (the London Bridge famous in the nursery jingle), an article on Landseer, the famous animal painter, beautifully illustrated, are all thoroughly entertaining though written with a serious purpose. A tale of two children and a lion, thrillingly illustrated by Sandham, gives the exciting element this month. Gregory meets with an unpleasant surprise in Sidney Luska's serial "My Uncle Florimond." Your newsdealer has this issue for 30 cents, or it will be mailed by the publishers, D. Lothrop Company, Boston. A couple back numbers of any of the Lothrop magazines cost but 5 cents.

The Presbyterian Witness, Halifax, N. S., says: "Of Father Chiniquy's new book we must frankly speak in superlatives. It far surpasses in interest any book hitherto issued by the author, and if we do not misjudge, it is sure to become a standard work relative to the internal economy of the Roman Catholic Church. The great organization of which he formed so brilliant and popular a member is laid bare in its innermost workings. The unveiling is in all cases profoundly interesting; it is not always distressing or humiliating. The book is brilliant on every page with the genius, and the rhetorical skill of the gifted author. The narratives are vivid and fascinating, and many chapters are of bright interest." "Adherents of the Church of England should read this book in order to realize the meaning of the Confessional. Presbyterians and others should read it to see the wisdom of sending their daughters to Convent and Nunnery Schools where the training is so superficial as it is known, and where the chief aim is to win the public over to the Church of Rome." In the Memory of J. J. Perkins, who died Aug. 5, 1887. Composed by his Wife.

My husband's voice is hushed in death,
I miss him everywhere;
He calmly sleeps in Riverside,
Beside our soldier boy.

At morning's dawn or evening's shade,
I miss him everywhere;
At table he no more gives thanks,
Or lifts his voice in prayer.

When in my quiet, lonely home
I kneel in earnest prayer,
And supplicate a Father's throne
For strength my lot to bear.

He used to cheer me when cast down,
And bid me joyful be,
But he can comfort me no more,
Or with me bend the knee.

His love was strong for God and truth,
His sufferings none could tell,
But as he neared the journey's end
He said that all was well.

And precious in the sight of him
Who bought us with his blood,
The death of those who keep the faith,
He'll raise them from the dead.

From out the darkness into light,
He endless life will share,
In resurrection glory bright,
A crown of life to wear.

O may we meet him in that land
Where tears will never flow,
And we among that happy band
Shall no more sorrow know.

"That Which is Born of the Flesh Is Flesh."—No. 2.

That Jesus affirmed in the above proposition that man was not finished, or possessed only his physical nature, the mere image, form of God, for his true likeness to God consisted in his possessing God's own nature and that a birth of flesh cannot impart that; this fact is taught also when God represents himself by the pen of Isaiah as the potter and the people the clay, which he is working into finished and perfected vessels for his own honor. Isa. lxiv. 8, reads, "But now, O Lord, thou art our Father; we are the clay, and thou our potter, and we all the work of thy hand." And so Jeremiah xviii. 6, "O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as the potter, saith the Lord. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel." And so Paul, Rom. ix. 20, 21, says, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that replies against God? Shall the thing formed say to Him that formed it, why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor?" These Scriptures establish the fact that our Father is "creating us in the Christ Jesus" in following the process of the potter in creating from clay pottery ware finished for use.

In the process of making pottery simple clay is the material. This is first fashioned by the potter into the form it is to bear, and when thus fashioned, it is set away on the shelf in the drying room, that all the water or moisture used to temper or prepare the clay and make it fit to be handled by the potter, may be dried out, and so it will be fit to have the extraordinary heat of the kiln applied to it without fracture or injury. This is not the entire process, for it has to be dipped in the fluid glaze, and fired a second time before it is finished ware. But the first process is sufficient for my illustration, and what I want to say here is this. No one would think of taking the ware out of the potter's drying room and before he had either fired or glazed it, put it in service as crockery! No, they know that at that stage of its make, it is but dried clay to which no artistic shape has been given, but that it possesses no higher attributes than clay.

Now we are but dust or clay, as evidenced by the fact that we return to dust, our original element, even as the dried clay vessel would speedily do if used as crockery, but after it has been finished, fired and glazed, I should like to see man who could reduce it back to clay. So after "flesh and blood" has been begotten by the word of truth "the word of the kingdom," quickened by the Spirit's inworking, matured and perfected by education and discipline, and the body of the Spirit by a resurrection from the dead, it cannot return to dust, it has been converted by Spirit power into Spirit, and possesses the nature and attributes of Spirit, and I believe not to say, but according to the Scriptures this is the only way by which flesh and blood individuals ever can ever become spiritual, and finally Spirits like their Maker, who has begotten them.

To continue of them while they remain upon their present plane of existence, they are "flesh and blood" beings which belong to them as the mind men, namely, "Sons of God," those "who are born of the Spirit" is simply ridiculous, and to insist that they are responsible for spiritual defects before they are "born of the Spirit," would be simply like the person who should condemn the dried clay of the potter because it is incapable of performing the service of finished crockery. So long as man is incomplete, only half made, he cannot be judged or condemned for not performing the service that will be obligatory on his finished nature. The bugaboo of wrath and punishment has served the hireling clergy's purpose to frighten people into church service and church sustenance, but Father has well considered his creation as in process of being accomplished, and would as soon hold the foetus in the womb of the mother as a responsible being, as his half-finished child, his simply "flesh and blood" child.

O fie for the illusion that has blinded the eyes and the hearts of the teachers of men, and bound heavy burdens upon their hearts and lives, and caused them to go mourning and sorrowful all their days till ended in physical death. Thank God light is shining; we feel at liberty to believe the words of Jesus regardless of men's theology or their systems, and rejoice that "the truth has made us free and we are free indeed," and we pray that the eyes of the understanding of our brethren with whom we have walked in common belief, may be opened, and that they may see the truth as taught by our Elder Brother, accept it, love it and bow submissively to its teaching. No logic or reasoning can invalidate the plain and emphasized teaching of our Lord. He took pains to emphasize as strongly as language would permit, the imperative truth he taught Nicodemus, "Ye must be born again." "The kingdom of God" cannot be perceived even, until you are "born again;" "flesh and blood" cannot see and therefore cannot enter "the kingdom of God." "Marvel not that I said unto you, ye must be born again." Again he emphasizes the subject in these words, "Verily, verily, (or most assuredly, most assuredly) I say unto thee, we speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen, and ye receive not our witness."

To doubt, to call in question, or hesitate to receive these testimonies of Jesus is all their emphasized force, is to invalidate his testimony as far as you individually are concerned, and will any one presume to antagonize the Lord Jesus who proclaimed himself "the Way, the Truth, the Life." A Judas under the impression that it was impossible to hold or operate successfully against the Lord, suffered his personal greed to receive the offered bribe, no doubt expecting that the authorities would have paid their money in vain. But his conduct was innocent as compared with that of those who attempt to invalidate "the truth," who place themselves in opposition to this plain and emphasized teaching, and insist that flesh and blood can see, perceive and weigh, and estimate the value of "the kingdom of God" to them, and can act intelligently and responsibly in relation to it. No matter, the apostle has affirmed that "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." This amounts to nothing. Man must be held responsible and condemned if he does not act wisely in relation to "the kingdom." Oh, there must be "the wisdom of this world" and "foolishness with God," because it ignores the facts of history, which upon their hypothesis would be found to be the most absurd and incredible. For instance, if man's eternal interest is of such pressing immediate necessity that every possible agency must be employed to save from impending destruction, which is suspended on the mere thread of life. It must have been always so, for "with God there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." Why then did God only record two divine teachers, Enoch and Noah, during the antediluvian age, 1656 years. And then 427 years before he even called Abraham, and 440 years from the call of Abraham to the giving of the law or the perfect installation of Moses as their teacher. And how many teachers did he provide Israel during the 1562 years of their organized economy to the entrance of Jesus on his mission? Only the regular priesthood and the prophets. But after Jesus entered his ministry did he not limit himself and his apostles to the lost sheep of the House of Israel, and the apostles to whom he committed the proclamation of the gospel till he gave the vision to Peter to go to the house of Cornelius? Do these facts justify the present frenzy to save souls, or rather our feeling that mere being with only half made, is not yet ready for "the blessing of the gospel?" I beg brethren to examine the subject in the fear of the Lord, remembering that nothing but truth is valuable, or life giving.

Among the Lions.

"The young lions roared upon him, and yelled, and they made his land waste; his cities are burned without inhabitant." Jer. ii. 15.

That comes of going from home, leaving sacred discipline, taking life into one's own hand, assuming the mastership of one's own fortune and destiny. Woe betide the man who goes beyond the bounds which God has fixed! Immediately outside those bounds the lions waste, or the plague, or the pestilence, or the pit hardly hidden but deep immeasurable. Luther said: "Who would paint a picture of the present condition of the Church, let him paint a young woman in a wilderness or in some desert place; and round about her let him figure hungry lions whose eyes are glaring upon her and whose mouths are open to devour her substance and her beauty." Is the Church in a much better condition today? That is the natural condition of the Church. The Church always challenges the lion, tempts the devourer, excites the passions of evil men. When an evil generation tolerates the Church, applauds its dogmas, and flatters its ministry, it is because that Church has surrendered her prerogatives and trampled her functions in the dust. "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." That is not a historical statement limited chronologically; it is the eternal truth: wherever there is light it must fight the darkness; wherever there is holiness it must judge all evil, and make bad men afraid, and set them on the defensive, and extort from them the most vehement denunciations. Beware of a fictitious peace; beware of the flattery of bad men; it is because you are turning your eyes away from their false weights and scales and measuring-rods; it is because you wink when you pass by their revels and their orgies; it is because you are deaf when you hear their evil speeches and their blasphemies. Know that the Church of the living God is alive, and is fulfilling her destiny, when all round about her are men more cruel than ravenous beasts. Israel, the home-born slave, who ought to have walked arm-in-arm with the son of the house, left the precincts of the family and plunged into the way of the lions.—Joseph Parker, D.D.

The Coming Age—Its Nature and Proximity. By J. F. Wetbee.

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. Its facts with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thoughts of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphy and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells as concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXVII. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, APRIL 18, 1888. NO. 15.

THE RESTITUTION

TERMS { One Year . . . $2.00.
Six Months . . . 1.00.
Three Months . . .50.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint rulers with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

GOD'S PURPOSE AND OBJECT IN MAKING MAN.

And God said, let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. Gen. i. 26. Here we perceive, that at the very start of the human race, the reason given why he was created. God made the earth for man, and man for the earth, as is stated, "the earth hath he given to the children of men." Now upon the line of what is so definitely stated in Gen. i. 26 the whole Bible is an elaboration. Upon this plane we have perfect harmony presented in the whole Scriptures of truth. Neither prophet, nor apostle, nor Jesus teach anything that clashes with this comprehensive statement. This of itself clearly indicates that the controlling spirit of God is guiding all things for the consummating of his purpose which he had in Christ Jesus before the world began. That his ultimate object, embraced Christ and his co-heirs, is fully sustained, and confirmed throughout the entire Scripture, I shall clearly show. That the inspired psalmist so understood it, is shown in Psa. viii. 6. "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet." etc. See how Paul understood it quoting from this very psalm. Heb. ii. 8. "But now we see not yet all things put under him." Do not these testimonies show a future for the fulfilment of the purpose of God? Not only so. But that it is "Christ and his co-heirs who were designed by God to be its inhabitants. Mortality is but a preliminary stage to this end. Sinless conditions are the essentials for the everlasting inheritance. Taking for a basis, what has been already said, we will now proceed to give the accumulative evidence of harmonious Scripture truth. We pass along down to the calling of Abraham. Here we have a strong link in the chain of evidence corroborative of the proposition stated. "I will give unto thy seed this land," Gen. xii. 7. Yes, says the casual reader, that is true, God did give the descendants of Abram, the land that he showed him. But what has that got to do with the subject you are considering. Well, let us look a little further. See Gen. xv. 7. "And he said unto him, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it." Here we see Abraham himself is to inherit the land. Well, but did he? Why not? If he did not, then the time is yet future when he is to inherit it. Again, see Gen. xvii. 8. "And I will give unto thee and thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God." Who will say that God is slack concerning his promises? I trust none will be so guilty. Such being the case these unfulfilled promises must literally be fulfilled. Is it not clear therefore, that Abraham must be raised from the dead, before he can inherit what was promised? But the objector might say, Did not Abraham's descendants according to the flesh inherit the land? Yes, partially so. But that was a temporary provision, there was nothing permanent about it. They continued not because of their iniquity. The Lord has cast them out. Where are they now? Scattered among the nations. Surely no one can say truly, God hath fulfilled the oath and promise he made to Abraham and his seed. Therefore we must look further for the everlasting inheritors. I think the apostle Paul put things in a very clear light for our understanding. See Rom. iv. 13. For says the apostle, "The promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith." We see now, that the law under which his natural descendants were placed, did not entitle them to the promised inheritance. Yet any of them who obeyed God, and clung to the faith of their father Abraham, became the children of promise, but no more so than those of any other nation who became the children of God, through the faith and its obedience. The promise made to Abraham took hold of future things, not of present. "For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect." The promise made to Abraham was a saving promise from the time it was made to all those who believed it, and lived in harmony with it. The law was simply an addition given 430 years after the promise. But it did not interfere in the least. The promise is still in force though the law has been abolished. I think I am correct, taking Paul for my guide. Let us learn a little more from him. "For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect." Here we see the law gave no privilege. Therefore it is of faith, to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, (those not under the law) who is the father of us all. Does not the apostle show clearly, that the promised inheritance is for those only who have the faith, whether of those under the law, or from among the Gentiles? We notice here that Paul speaks of the promise being sure to all the seed. And by consulting what he says in Galatians we learn that this all constitutes a multitudinous unity. All embraced in the one, and that one Christ. See Gal. iii. 16. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ." We see surely from this, that Christ is personally interested. Such being the case, all those who are in him are equally interested. Why? because they are partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel. This of course includes Gentiles as well as Jews. There are some very wise people in this world, or in their own conceit, who do not think that these promises are necessary to understand or believe before they are baptized. Or in other words, that they are no part of the essentials of the faith that saves. It would seem as if they were hiding the light under a bushel of rubbish, lest Paul answer such. But the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, (Jew and Gentile) that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe. Believe what? What has Paul been writing about? Why that Christ was the seed referred to in the promise made to Abraham. Inevitably then the believer must understand what Paul is talking about, and be interested also in it. Yes, but says the objector, does not Paul say, before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterward be revealed. What do you make of that? Certainly not confusion, but harmony. Does not Paul say the law was added? Added to what? I would ask the objector, What can you say but that the law was added to the promise? Whom did the promise refer to? Christ? When the seed came to whom the promise was made, the law which was a schoolmaster had served its purpose what remains? Faith in Christ as the one to whom the promise was made. Justification by faith in him without the deeds of the law. The objector might seem to think it is a different kind of faith now that Christ is come. I can see no difference but this, and that is, that Jesus is the Christ, the one presented to us as the hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers. Jesus was Abraham's hope, Moses's hope. David and all the faithful of Israel, looked forward to the coming of Christ as their hope. He was the object of faith, from the garden of Eden, down to this present time. But Paul has something more to say. "For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. And if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." Yes, according to some, a person may become an heir according to promise, and yet know nothing about it. He need not know whether Christ is referred to in the promised inheritance. Such teaching may please the multitude, but cannot enlighten them about the Christ who died for us according to the Scriptures.
